YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, JULY 2ND, 1910.

DEATH.

MILLER.—On June 25th, at her residence in Tokyo, MARY EDDY, wife of the Rev. E. ROTHE-SAY MILLER.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

THE post-office on Mount Asama was to open its business on the 1st ult.

THEIR Majesties the Emperor and Empress have granted the sum of 3,000 yen to the family of the late Vi count Saisho, in recognition of his services to the state.

A CO SACK GIRL has started to ride from Harbin to St. Peter-burg—a distance of some 5,420 miles. Her mount is a light grey Mongolian pony, and she is riding astride on an ordinary Cossack saddle. She carries a hunting knife and a revolver, and her only companion is a pure-bred St. Bernard dog.

THE training cruiser Kasagi, with sixty naval cadets on board, will shortly leave for Chemulpo, Dairen and Port Arthur.

THE Mayor of Indianapolis has ordered all policemen to carry rules, and measure any hat-pin which appear to exceed the legal limit (half an inch beyond the brim of the hat.)

DUKE and Duchess Johann Albrecht who have been staying at Nikko since Wednesday, are expected to leave for Hakone. From Hakone they will proceed to Kyoto, Osaka, and Nara.

A SHANGHAI telegram received by the Hochi reports that great inundations have occurred at Changte, in Hunan. Several hundred houses have been washed away and several thousand people drowned.

THE construction of the new cruiser Yahagi has commenced at Tategami works of the Nagasaki Dockyard. The displacement is 4,950 tons, with 2,250 horse-power, average draught 16 feet, and 26 knots speed.

THE Shihinami, one of the two destroyers which had run aground in Ise Bay and subsequently undergone repairs at the Toba Dockyard, left the latter place on Monday morning for Yokosuka, towed by the steamer Kurihashi Maru.

A NEW steamer, the Mexico Maru, will be launched from the slips of the Mitsu Bishi Dockyard at Nagasaki on July 3rd, at 4 p.m. She is a sister-ship to the Panama Maru, and is intended for the Osaka Shosen Kaisha's American service.

A MAYEBASHI telegram says that Mount Asama showed signs of activity last Saturday morning. Small quantities of ashes fell in the districts of Naganohara, Matsueda, and Tomioka, at the foot of the mountain. No damage was done to the crops.

A KOBE despatch says that the authorities of the Middle School in that city have recently prohibited the students from visiting theatres for cinematograph performances. The decision is said to have caused great discontent among the students.

A PEKING telegram received by the Asahi says that as the result of the conference before the Throne, the petition for the speedy opening, by the representatives from the Provinces, was again rejected. At the same time an Imperial edict was issued.

THE Korean Crown Prince will start for a tour in the Sanyo and Sanin districts on the 13th inst. Prince Ito, Assistant-Grand-Master of Ceremonies, Mr. Kurihara, Secretary of the Imperial Household Department, and two Court physicians have been appointed to accompany the Prince.

AN interesting exhibition will be opened at Osaka in October next. The exhibition is intended to be a competitive show illustrative of the art of packing. The same kind of exhibition was undertaken at Osaka in 1904 under the auspices of the Osaka Chamber of Commerce. The forthcoming exhibition will be under the same auspices, and packers throughout the country are invited to participate by sending their exhibits. Complaints have been heard on all sides of the poor style of packing so common with Japanese goods, especially in the case of those exported to Chinese ports. It is expected that the exhibition will prove useful and beneficial in every way.

At a meeting of the stockholders of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, held at New York on May 25th, Mr. William G. Rockefeller was elected a director in place of the late Mr. E. H. Harriman, and Mr. Mortimer D. Schiff was chosen to succeed Mr. W. V. S. Thorne. The other directors were re-elected.

AN improved telegraphic machine has recently been invented by a Chinese merchant named Hu Yung-tsao, at Canton. The first trial having been satisfactory, the inventor applied to the Taotai at that place for another trial of the machine to be witnessed by the latter and asking that the machine be sent to the Nanking Exhibition. The Taotai has promised to comply with the request.

THE window placed in the village church at Princetown as a memorial for American prisoners of the war of 1812 was unveiled on the 4th ult. The church stands in Dartmoor, a bleak stretch of tableland in the south part of Devonshire, and near the historic Dartmoor prison, where the American sailors were confined. It was recently restored by Americans, who also purchased the memorial window.

ON the 27th ult. a fire took place on board the collier Shinko Maru (2,588 tons) when in Moji port, in process of taking in cargo. The accident was due to the carelessness of a coolie, who let fall a lighted metal hand-lamp into an oil tank. The man was instantly killed and two others were injured. Fortunately the flames were extinguished before they spread to any serious extent and no great damage was sustained by the vessel.

A TERRIBLE FATALITY is reported from the Merapi, an active volcano in East Java, which is a favourite spot for tourists. On May 30th, a party out on a picnic went to the top of the mountain. One of them, a Miss Sineck, stood at the crater edge. Suddenly there was an eruption a big stone struck her on the head, and she fell into a stream of lava. A doctor who examined the body certified that the blow from the stone must have killed her on the spot.

THE annual report of the Department of the British Colonial Office, which looks after the affairs of the overseas dominions, has been issued, and is an admirable survey of the principal events oversea for last year. The trade returns for 1909 show that Great Britain's total trade with foreign countries was £811,106,552, while the colonies' total trade with these countries was £283,123,572. Great Britain's imports from colonies were £145,521,939 and exports £127,238,084.

GOVERNOR FUKANO, of Aichi prefecture, who is now staying in Tokyo, is quoted as saying that the recent Nagoya Exhibition has greatly helped in developing that city and that in the future the importation of goods by land and sea will be greatly increased. In order to facilitate communications Nagoya harbour should be enlarged so as to enable steamers of 4,000 to 5,000 tons to enter without any hindrance. It is now projected to raise a prefectural loan of three million yen with a view to attaining the above object.

FORMOSA.

Friday, June 24.

The fighting continues in Formosa, and as yet it does not appear that there have been any signal results. Up to the afternoon of the 22nd inst. the casualties among the Japanese regulars were three officers killed, two severely wounded and one slightly wounded; two non-commissioned officers and twenty privates killed, and 44 rank and file wounded.

From remarks attributed to General Sakuma we arrive at last at a clear understanding of the course of the campaign. Our readers will have observed that the talk has hitherto been of fighting in Gilan only, but as a matter of fact the Gilan district has already been subjugated, and the frequent references to it which occurs in the accounts, signify merely that it is the basis of the present operations. The real objective point is the Gaogan region, where there are seven villages inhabited by from 1,700 to 5,000 people—the accounts vary between these two numbers. This Gaogan is, in fact, the crest of the mountains dividing the territory of the aborigines from the peaceful region of the island. Once these mountains are crowned, a descent can be commenced against the head-quarters of the aborigines at Taroko, near the eastern coast, where again various numbers are stated for the population, some accounts putting it at 10,000 folks and others at from 50,000 to 60,000. The aborigines at Taroko have a considerable armament, including some cannon, and they are capable of giving considerable annoyance. It appears that these people are childishly superstitious, and that they place the most implicit reliance in, and accord the most unreasoning allegiance to, their chiefs. Therefore if they once made act of surrender, their fealty can be subsequently counted on. They worship the moon and the monkey, and it is on record that some years ago, when a Chinese ship approached Taito on the east coast, the light at her mast's head was mistaken by the aborigines for the moon, and they offered no resistance. This is compared by the Japanese newspapers to the experience of the Turks when they invaded Egypt: the symbol of a cat on the Turkish banners quelled all Egyptian opposition. The Formosan aborigines seem to illustrate the law of protection by mimicry. They wear no clothes, except a narrow waist band, and their skin has assumed a hue closely resembling that of earth, so that when they are in a forest and have donned their usual head-dress, namely, a chaplet of leaves or a wisp of grass, they are scarcely distinguishable from their environment. They are said to be extraordinarily skilled marksmen, scarcely one of their bullets failing to find its billet. Such folks must prove very difficult to deal with in a military sense. The women act as baggage-carriers, and their agility is extraordinary. They have by this time learned that the wire entanglement charged with electricity is a serious obstacle only when it comes in direct contact with it. Accordingly they throw logs of trees on the wires or cut the posts, and having thus destroyed the obstacle, they move over it unscathed for their raids on the Aiyu lines. Their arms are mostly old-pattern rifles, but they have learned to use them with great skill. Their stock of ammunition, however, cannot last much longer, as strenuous precautions are taken to patrol the east coast, so as to prevent any smuggling of weapons of war. General Sakuma is quoted as saying that these aborigines, although they are little removed from savages, have a strong feeling of patriotism and are as brave as men can be. The soles of their feet are like leather, so that they can traverse ground of any nature. They are in possession of a good many excellent rifles, of the Mauser and Snider patterns, and it is reckoned that they have about 50,000 rounds of ammunition. They fight always at positions from 6,000 to 8,000 feet above sea-level, and in the thick forests that grow there immense difficulty is encountered by the troops. The Japanese have orders never to fire a shot without taking careful aim, and thus the war resolves itself in a series of duels between individuals.

The General is further alleged to have said that the Formosan aborigines seem to have a racial likeness to the Japanese, but we confess that the proofs he adduces are not convincing. Certainly the resistance successfully offered by these aborigines to the attempts made in former days by the Chinese, the Dutch and the Spaniards to subjugate them shows that they are a brave and resolute people.

Saturday, June 25.

Naturally the fighting in Formosa is beginning to attract much attention in Japan. The fight in the Gilan district on the 20th and 21st is said to have lasted an entire day and night, and not until the afternoon of the second day were the aborigines beaten off and compelled to resort to sharpshooter tactics. During that time the Japanese troops had three officers and 22 non-commissioned officers killed and three officers and 44 rank and file wounded. How things fared with the Aiyu forces in each engagement, precise information is not furnished, but since the beginning of the operations their losses have totalled 39 killed and 60 wounded. The former figure includes 11 Japanese, and the latter 24 Japanese.

Mr. Saito, a Japanese member of the Lower House, who has just returned from a visit to Formosa, reports that when he was on his way to the Gilan region on the 11th of this month, he encountered a number of Aiyu and police who were in full retreat and had evidently lost spirit. It appears that the reason of their discomfiture was the treacherous behaviour of a number of aborigines, who having surrendered some time ago were enrolled in a band of auxiliaries, and detached to guard the Japanese commissariat. These men communicated secretly with the aborigines at Gaogan, and acted as the latter's guides in an attack upon the rear of the Japanese position at the most critical time. Nearly all the provisions of the invading force were captured, and a considerable number of the Aiyu and their leaders were killed and wounded. In fact, when Mr. Saito arrived at the Gilan positions he found about 100 wounded men.

Another and even more serious result of this disaster was that an Aiyu force of 150 men found itself completely isolated, and surrounded on all sides by the enemy. It was when advancing on the 21st inst. for the purpose of re-establishing communication with the isolated body that Captain Kawada and two Lieutenants were killed. Captain Kawada's case is specially lamentable, as he had served his full period of three and a half years in Formosa and was to have returned immediately.

It appears that however uncivilized these aborigines be, they understand pretty well the art of constructing entrenchments. Mr. Saito says that on a hill called Wohi-zan they have erected a stockade which is built of bamboos and earth-bags precisely after the fashion of the Russian earthworks at Kikwanshan in Port Arthur. These earthworks are provided with underground passages, and the aborigines invariably retire into them when darkness sets in. Mr. Saito speaks in feeling terms of the scanty sympathy shown towards the men who are fighting this most arduous campaign. The hardships of the work are extreme and the dangers acute. Yet scarcely any effort is made by outsiders to provide comforts for the troops, nor is there any honour bestowed on those that lose life or limb in combatting an enemy greatly underrated.

Sunday, June 26.

The fight in the Gilan district, which continued from the 21st to 23rd inst., was followed by a cessation of attack, the aborigines withdrawing and confining themselves to sniping operations. Thus, on the 23rd, communications were at length established with the isolated Japanese troops, and a supply of provisions was furnished. It is not thought, however, that the aborigines are quelled by any means. Their retreat is only temporary, and when they have obtained a fresh commissariat, they will doubtless renew their assaults. Meanwhile the military has definitely assumed charge of the situation. One of the greatest difficulties with which the Japanese have to contend is the nature of the country. The fighting is taking place among mountains and forests at a height of some 6,000 feet above the sea. There are no roads, and an apparently inaccessible path is often found to lead to the brink of a precipice or the face of a cliff. In these circumstances the work of transporting provisions and carrying away the wounded is most arduous, especially as the native coolies desert at the first symptom of danger. As for the aborigines, they lie concealed in places which are virtually invisible, and from thence they watch every Japanese movement, and take every opportunity to fire an effective shot.

Monday, June 27.

There is no very striking news from Formosa this morning. Official sources of intelligence are silent, but newspaper correspondents wire that the attack in full force which was expected from the aborigines, and for which full preparations had been made by the Japanese, has not yet taken place. It is significant that no approximate estimate has yet been officially attempted as to the losses of the aborigines, the plain inference being that they hold their fighting position securely, up to the present at all events. It is rumoured that the chief of a village called Gen fell in the recent fight, and that his death has greatly discouraged the aborigines. It is further stated that the bursting of a three inch shell from a field-piece demoralized the people of Kuru hamlet. But these statements must be taken with reserve.

Mr. Saito Keiji, a member of the House of Representatives, who has just returned from Formosa, is quoted by Tokyo journals. He says that the total number of aborigines who remain to be subdued is 120,000, inhabiting 671 villages and possessing an area of 12,000 square ri (1 square ri = $6\frac{1}{4}$ square miles). The fiercest tribe amongst the whole number are the Atayaru, and of these the fiercest fighters are those in the Gaogan district, where the Japanese are now employed. For 31 days prior to the commencement of the present campaign, the conditions existing had been carefully investigated, and all possible preparations had been made. The main programme is to construct a road 50 miles long from Yensan, in the Gilan district, to the Japanese headquarters in the south. Ten miles of the road have been built in the north and 12 miles in the south, but the intervening space is held firmly by the aborigines. The programme was to put into the field 1,000 Aiyu, officered by Japanese constables and inspectors, together with an equal number of baggage bearers. These were divided into five bodies and were to advance with a front of seven ri, preceded by a number of aborigines of the Nango district, who long ago surrendered. The objective was to crown a range of hills 8,000 feet high, and commanding the position of the aborigines. This programme was fatally interrupted by an abuse of confidence on the part of the Keito aborigines. These men professed the greatest loyalty, and assured the Japanese commander that so long as they were in front no resolute attempt by the enemy need be apprehended. Relying on their assurances, the left wing of the advancing force neglected to fortify itself by placing obstacles and planting electric entanglements. The fighting commenced on the 9th instant, and on the following day a force of 300 aborigines, under the guidance of the treacherous Keito men, made their appearance on the left flank of the Japanese line and succeeded in getting into the rear of the latter. This appears to have been the main cause of disaster, but it would also seem that there was a deficiency of ammunition on the right wing, and that the aborigines succeeded in cutting the communications between two sections of the Aiyu line. Thereafter they fiercely assailed the segregated section, and destroyed its commissariat completely, so that retreat became absolutely inevitable. (We suppose the above dates to be incorrect, and that the real dates are the 19th, 20th and the 21st.) It was at this juncture that the military reinforcements arrived from Taipeh under Captain Kawada. They were not provided with obstacles usually employed in an advance against the aborigines, but Kawada deemed it so imperative to render immediate succour to the isolated detachment that he pushed on at once, and in the fight of the 20th and 21st succeeded in restoring the situation, but not without heavy loss. Many of the Aiyu and all the baggage-carriers seem to have behaved with remarkable cowardice. They made the best of their way to the rear, and their officers were content to let them go rather than take the risk of treachery. Apparently the programme now underwent a material change. It was decided that the Gilan troops should merely hold their ground, and that a diversion should be made by an advance from Shinchiku. Mr. Saito confirms statements made by others as to the great skill shown by the aborigines in concealing their own bodies among the trees and underwood and in the use of the rifle. The casualties incurred in ordinary warfare do not exceed 10 per cent. of the troops engaged, but a fight with these Formosan aborigines generally means a loss of 20 per cent. One is reminded of the accounts of the Maori campaign in New Zealand many years ago, when the stockades and pits used by the Maoris proved so difficult and so deadly to deal with. The Formosan aborigines are evidently adepts in constructing and utilizing such defences.

Wednesday, June 29.

Telegrams from Formosa dated the 28th inst. indicate that there is temporary cessation of fighting. The aborigines have withdrawn, but appearances indicate that a band of about 100 are preparing to renew the attack. The Japanese have therefore sent out a reconnoitering party under the command of an officer. It is believed that the aborigines have abandoned the field, not with an idea of ultimate surrender, but merely for the purpose of harvesting the millet crop, which is now ripe. As soon as that is accomplished they will recommence the fighting. One can very well understand that from their point of view the Japanese are mere marauders, who invade other people's territories and destroy their belongings.

It appears that the brunt of the fighting occurred after the military reinforcement from Taipeh had reestablished communications with the isolated Aiyu on Ponponyama. Up to that time there had been no severe fighting so far as the military were concerned, but just as the relievers and the relieved were congratulating each other the aborigines opened a hot fire. It was then that Capt. Kawada and three other officers were shot down.

Capt. Kawada received a bullet in his breast, but he did not desist from fighting for some time, and when he finally dropped his last words were, "Keep my head out of the hands of the aborigines." The command was then taken by Lieut. Nozawa. He was shot almost immediately in the left arm and the head and he dropped with the one word "Zannen." Lieut. Fujinami was next killed and Captain Urushizaki received four bullets before he succumbed. After the fight the bodies of Capt. Kawada and 27 rank and file were burned and the ashes sent to Taipeh.

It need hardly be said that this lamentable loss of life affords material for criticism by parlour publicists. If signal success had been achieved, these gentlemen would doubtless have said that no occasion had existed for extraordinary exertion. But now that the operation has proved painful and costly, they say that it should have been differently conducted. One journal goes so far as to hint that General Viscount Sakuma, being an old man, desired to make a signal coup before he retired from the scene.

Thursday, June 30.

There is a momentary lull of hostilities in Formosa. The aborigines are engaged in gathering their crops and the Japanese are taking steps to provide sufficient protection in the district which they have already occupied. In the absence of any intelligence as to the losses suffered by the aborigines in the recent encounter, it is impossible to foresee when they are likely to resume hostilities, but on the side of the Japanese it is merely a question of a few military works. Our readers will have perceived that whereas the campaign was commenced originally by constables and Aiyu solely on the Japanese side, General Sakuma subsequently ordered the military to coöperate, and thus the enterprise has assumed dimensions of unlooked-for magnitude.

The report said to have been officially received from the Formosan Government to the Home Department in Tokyo, states that according to accounts brought in by friendly aborigines, the enemy suffered so heavily in the recent engagement, that their spirit has been considerably broken. A curious feature of the affair is that many aborigines received bayonet wounds. It appears that they were not aware of the fact that a bayonet can be attached to the muzzle of a rifle, and thus they threw themselves recklessly on the Japanese when close quarters were reached. It will be remembered that a movement was made from Shinchiku for the purpose of creating a diversion. It appears to have succeeded, for a body of the Gaogan aborigines were withdrawn from their position to meet a Shinchiku invasion.

MR. WANG.

The new Chinese Representative to the Court of Japan, Mr. Wang Ta-shieh, is to travel round Manchuria on his way to Tokyo, in order to acquaint himself with the problems still outstanding between his country and Japan with regard to the Three Eastern Provinces. It is said that the solution of these problems will be largely entrusted to him.

There appears to be a strong movement in condemnation of Mr. Wang's appointment to Tokyo. His principal assailants are Chinese students, some now studying in Japan and others having returned to their country on the conclusion of their education. It will be remembered that Mr. Wang was serving as inspector of students in Japan some years ago, when the Educational Department of this country issued, for the better control of Chinese students, a series of regulations which were much resented by the students. Mr. Wang, on that trying occasion, seemed to take a just and judicious course, but the students did not approve of his attitude, and are now exerting themselves against him. Hostility is also shown from another quarter, namely, the people of the provinces most directly concerned in the building of the Yangtsz Valley railways. Mr. Wang happened to be Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs at the time when these people agitated so strongly against recourse to foreign money, and they appear to think that he did not exert his influence sufficiently in their cause.

Mr. Wang, the new representative of China at the Court of Japan, is now in Mukden, discussing with the Viceroy the various problems that have arisen or are likely to arise between Japan and China with regard to the Three Eastern Provinces. His Excellency was to leave Tuesday morning and to proceed by train to Antung, where a steamer will be placed at his disposal by the South Manchuria Railway to carry him to Dairen. He will then visit Port Arthur, and return to Peking via Newchwang. His final departure from Peking for Tokyo is expected to take place about the 7th or 8th of next month.

The sales of Japanese exhibits at the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition amounted to £3,341.45 on June 8.

KOREA.

Friday, June 24.

News from Seoul is to the effect that a secret party has been formed in the Korean capital, and that its members have sworn on the sword to assassinate the present and the former leaders of the Il Ching-hoi. The police are said to be diligently endeavouring to trace this conspiracy. On the heels of this news came a statement that the new Resident-General had been shot and Seoul was thrown into a state of great excitement. The Koreans ought by this time to understand that all such proceedings must only hasten the end they are intended to avert.

There has been much talk about police affairs in Korea, and a few words of explanation may be timely. In 1907, the organization of the police and gendarmery in the Peninsula was arranged on the basis that the police should be under the control of the Korean authorities, but that their important officers should, as far as possible, be Japanese subjects acting as Korean employes; while the gendarmes should be under the control of the Residency-General, and should consist of 2,000 gendarmes proper and 4,000 assistant gendarmes, by which two bodies the functions of military police should be discharged. In 1908, at the request of the Korean Government, and with the consent of the Resident-General, this system was altered in the sense of allowing the gendarmes to act in co-operation with the police. An important change has now been made, namely, that the police power shall be entrusted wholly to the Resident-General. This proposal is understood to have emanated from the Residency-General, and the telegraph says that it has been duly approved by the Korean Cabinet. Of course, such a change is variously interpreted in Seoul, and is said to have caused considerable excitement there.

It is now stated that Messrs. Yamagata, Ariyoshi and Usami will start for Korea on the 1st proximo, and that the Resident-General himself will follow about ten days later.

From a place called Pingkwang, in the province of Kwangon-do, intelligence has been received that at 1 p.m. on the 22nd inst. a party of insurgents attacked a Roman Catholic Mission School at that place. They seem to have directed their rifles against the school from the moment of getting into range; and they ultimately burned the whole of the buildings, tied up and carried off the principal teacher and stole all the money and valuables that could be found.

Saturday, June 25.

Various conjectures continue to be formulated about the fate of Korea. Three of them may be mentioned here. One is that when the convention providing a solution of the various problems still outstanding between Japan and Russia in Manchuria is concluded, the amalgamation of the Peninsula with the Japanese Empire will be immediately announced. It is not claimed that any direct relation exists between the two things, but merely that the above will be the natural sequence of events. The second matter of conjecture relates to the military police. The Japanese Government desires nothing less than to have recourse to military strength in consummating the amalgamation of Korea. Therefore by way of preliminary, the organization and the establishment of the military police have received special consideration, so that these preservers of peace and order may be available in sufficient force should an occasion for employing them arise. Finally, the inclusion of Korea in the list of places to which the jurisdiction of the new Colonial Bureau extends is regarded as another sign of the times. Not that it is actually intended to place Korea in the rank of Japanese Colonies, but, none the less, the fact that the management of Korean affairs is entrusted to such a Bureau cannot be regarded as insignificant.

With regard to the reported resignation of the Korean Premier Mr. Yi Wan-yong, it is confidently affirmed that several of his colleagues in the Cabinet did actually advise him to take that course, apparently by way of protest against the fate which menaces his country. But Mr. Yi is said to have replied in a decidedly exalted strain. He is quoted as declaring that the history of nations and the circumstances of the era all teach the same lesson, namely, that the fate of the small is to be absorbed by the great. It is idle to struggle against the inevitable. Statesmen who withdraw from public life rather than face problems which have to be solved, cannot be called patriotic. Their plain duty is to remain at their posts, so as to guide the affairs of their countrymen into the happiest and most prosperous routes. In other words, instead of shirking responsibility, they have to mould the unavoidable into the best form that can be given to it. Therefore he declines to resign.

With regard to the transfer of police authority to the Residency-General, it is stated that although the consent of the Korean Cabinet has been secured, the Emperor's approval has not yet been obtained, and some little time may be needed for that purpose.

It is very satisfactory to learn that a timely rainfall has averted the danger of a failure of the rice crop in Korea. Considerable anxiety was felt owing to the long drought, but it is now thought that if the weather hereafter proved normal, an excellent crop may be expected.

We take the following interesting note from the Seoul Press :—

Mr. Mukozaka, an agricultural expert, publishes an illuminative report on Korean peasants. He has made thorough inquiries at Hyong village, Suwon district, which is inhabited by no very rich farmers. Small peasant proprietors constitute the richer class of the village in question, while tenants ploughing a leasehold of seven tan (little less than 2 acres) of fields are regarded as belonging to the middle class. In his report Mr. Mukozaka gives as typical of the richer class a proprietor peasant with a freehold of 14 tan, of which only six tan are of wet field and eight of dry field. His family comprises eight members, of whom four cannot make any contribution to its joint agricultural labour. Besides, he has a permanent employee, and will lease 14 tan of wet field. The twenty tan of wet fields are devoted to the cultivation of rice, and the dry fields to the production of barley, beans and millet, as well as raw cotton and vegetables for domestic use. He keeps also a cow, two pigs and a few fowls. The gross income of the farmer a year will amount to 302 yen and his expenses 297 yen. This means that only 5 yen is left which he may deposit with the savings bank. Mr. Mukozaka then produces a tenant with a leasehold of seven tan. His household consists of four, of whom two are quite unproductive. He has not his own land, and of his leasehold six tan is of wet field on which rice will be planted. Working together with his wife on the lease as hard as any honest and industrious native peasant does, he can get an annual income of 71 yen and is calculated to spend 70 yen including living expenses. A glance at these figures will not inspire any envy in Japanese farmers at home, but Mr. Mukozaka tells us that in spite of the figures he was able to collect, a well-to-do family at Hyong village appears to save between forty and fifty yen a year, while a tenant will save some fifteen yen. In Japan a freehold of at least one cho (10 tan) will be required for a family of eight to be maintained by a peasant proprietor, and there is apparently no great difference in Korea in this respect. We, however, have to make allowance for the larger amount of fixed capital required in Japan for the acquisition of landed property, which is valued at many times that of Korean fields. When all things are thus compared, it is evident that agriculturists will find a more easy life here than in Japan.

Sunday, June 26.

The text of a convention concluded in Seoul on the 24th inst. between the representatives of the Resident-General and the Prince Minister, is telegraphed to the Asahi Shimbun. The document sets out by declaring that its object is to complete the reform of the police system in Korea and to strengthen the basis of Korean finance. The first article provides that the control of the Korean police shall be in Japan's hands until such time as the force is considered to be in a complete and satisfactory condition. The second article provides that with regard to the Palace police, the Minister of the Imperial Household shall have competence to control them in due consultation with the officials concerned. This convention was promulgated on the 23rd inst. but the date of the enforcement of the new system has not been telegraphed. The convention is said to be accompanied by a note which provides that the sum hitherto appropriated in the Korean budget for police purposes shall hereafter be handed over to the Residency-General. It is thus believed that no additional expense will be incurred by Japan in consequence of the change. It is further explained, though not in writing, that while the above distinction is made between the ordinary police and the Palace police, the special authority delegated to the Minister of the Household will extend only to minor matters, and will be exercised with the approval of the Police authorities.

The Mainichi Dempo explains that the draft of the above convention was handed to the Korean Prime Minister on the 22nd inst., but as his Excellency asked for a detailed statement of the method of distributing and employing the police under the proposed system, and also raised points with reference to the policing of the Palace, telegraphic reference had to be made to Tokyo, and consequently the convention could not be signed until the 24th instant.

Chinnampo is to have electric lights by the close of this year. A German firm in Moji has secured the concession.

Monday, June 27.

The removal of police authority from Korean hands to Japanese does not seem to have produced any strong feeling in the Peninsula. Either the people have not yet appreciated the fact fully or they have become more or less indifferent to matters of international politics. Some of the vernacular newspapers take the line that Korea is being deprived of her independence little by little. Now a finger is lopped off; now a toe, and soon there will be nothing left of the carcass. But beyond this there is no display of sentiment.

The correspondent of the Mainichi Dempo says that the original intention was to consummate this transaction with as little display as possible and merely by an exchange of diplomatic notes. The Korean Cabinet, however, decided that a matter of such importance should be effected by formal methods, and accordingly the transfer was embodied in a convention. Moreover the problem of policing the Palace was considered to be of vital importance. As for the fact that no date has been fixed for the enforcement of the convention, the explanation given is that the Korean Ministry ask for time to draw up the necessary rules and regulations. It is thought that this has been effected now, and it is believed that the convention will go into force before the end of the current month.

It is stated that 25 Korean students studying in Tokyo have left for home in view of the imminence of amalgamation. They passed through Shimomoseki on the night of the 25th inst., and the belief is that they will be followed by others. Naturally they are supposed to contemplate some anti-Japanese agitation.

There are no less than eight political or semi-political parties in Korea. Their names are enumerated by an anonymous publicist speaking in the columns of the Yomiuri Shimbun, but we refrain from tormenting our readers with a string of incomprehensible titles. Among these eight parties, one only, namely, the Il Ching-hoi, is genuinely favourable to Japan. Each unit of the eight could perhaps describe his political opinions in such a manner as to differentiate them slightly from those of the rest, but the real line of cleavage is anti-Japanese and pro-Japanese. Even this line, too, is more or less indistinct, the most potential motive being self-interest. Practically every party is seeking to install itself in the seats of power. The Yomiuri's informant thinks it most essential that some decisive steps should be taken with regard to these parties, but, as is not unusual with tenderers of advice, he does not indicate any way of carrying out his counsels.

Tuesday, June 28.

The Japanese police, numbering 17,000 men, who had hitherto been serving in Korea, and the Korean police numbering 2,000, have all to be transferred to the control of the Resident-General in the near future, and it is stated that the necessary arrangements have been made without any difficulty, except that some officials who expect to be dismissed are absenting themselves from their duties.

Wednesday, June 29.

Telegrams to the Asahi from Seoul represent an unsettled state of affairs as having arisen in Korea. This is directly connected with the transfer of police authority from the Korean Government to the Chinese, but indirectly it is an ebullition of the always latent anti-Japanese feeling. We spoke in a recent issue of a party of Koreans that swore on their swords to slaughter all prominent Korean statesmen and Japanese officials connected with the amalgamation movement. It is now stated that these men have formed themselves into two bands, and that one party have directed their steps to Omthang, where the Prime Minister is staying for the benefit of his health, and the other party have proceeded to Japan. These agitators are under the leadership of two men named Chu and Kim. Moreover the Korean students who recently left Tokyo, have reached Seoul, and are said to be there plotting some kind of a move under the command of a certain Chai.

Our readers are aware that among the various political coteries in Seoul there is one whose members pay to the Japanese Unionists the compliment of copying their title (Seiyun-kai). These political agitators are said to have just presented a memorial to the Residency-General containing three requests. The first is that Japan will solve the present uncertain situation by adopting a decisive policy towards Korea. This can be interpreted only as a plea for amalgamation. The second is that a plan should be devised for the relief of the Yangpan, many of whom are reduced to great straits. The third item of the petition is that the various political parties should be reorganized into one strong body, under the guidance of a distinguished publicist, and that a sum of 100,000 yen should be allowed for the purpose.

Among the rumours current in Seoul one is said to be that the Japanese Government has decided to place the present Crown Prince upon the throne of Korea, under the regency of Prince Yi Chumyong. It is added that the younger brother of Lady Om sends constant reports in that sense from Tokyo where he is now residing.

Thursday, June 30.

The Prime Minister has returned from the hot springs at Omthang, where he had been sojourning for some time to recuperate from the effects of his wound. His return seems to have been somewhat unexpected, but it is explained that he would have repaired to the capital in any case before the arrival of the Vice-Resident-General, Mr. Yamagata. None the less the general belief seems to be that His Excellency's movements were more or less influenced by the intelligence circulated in Seoul and reproduced in these columns on the 29th inst. to the effect that a section of a party of agitators, sworn to make away with all their country's leading statesmen, had repaired to Omthang, and as it would have been impossible to guarantee the Premier against peril so long as he remained at that place, his intention of returning to the Capital was carried out quickly. Seoul is said to be considerably excited, but it is exceedingly difficult to discover the truth. One observer telegraphs that things are quite quiet; another, that the air is full of menace, and between the two the public remains bewildered.

The night of the 28th inst. was the time of Mr. Yi's return to Seoul, and on the 29th he summoned all the members of the Cabinet to a secret meeting which is said to have lasted for several hours. Necessarily the Premier must have many things to discuss after his long absence from duty, and that he should confer at length with his colleagues is perfectly natural. But the incident is none the less recounted in sensational style. As for the rumoured resignation of the Cabinet en bloc, it is now emphatically denied.

The doings of the Korean students, both those that are studying in Tokyo and those that have returned suddenly to Seoul, are said to be carefully watched by the police. Rumour alleges that these youths are not only endeavouring to stir up a tumult at home but have also placed themselves in communication with the anti-Japanese party in Vladivostock.

On the 30th inst. the text of the convention by which the control of police in Korea is handed over to the Japanese Government was published in the Official Gazette. The reasons assigned for the measure are, to perfect the police organization in Korea and to consolidate the basis of Korean finance. The arrangement is to continue in force until it is considered that the Korean police have become thoroughly efficient. With regard to the personnel, there is to be a Chief, of chokunin rank, two Assistant Chiefs, one of chokunin rank, if expedient, the other a sonin. We need not enter into details of organization. The Chief is to be the officer in command of the gendarmerie in Korea, who will thus combine the duties of two offices. Considerable importance is attached by the press to this feature. The system goes into operation from to-day (July 1st). Of course the commissioned ranks in the police will be open to Korean subjects, but they will be required to possess high qualifications.

TIBET.

The Asahi has a very confident article about the future of Tibet. It says that China is thoroughly tired of complications arising from confusion between religion and politics. The Dalai Lama is at once head of the civil administration and of the Buddhist Church, a dual role which leads to perpetual difficulties and misunderstandings. China has therefore practically determined, according to our Tokyo contemporary, to put a final end to this unsatisfactory state of affairs. She will confine the Dalai Lama strictly to affairs connected with the church, and will deprive him of all right of interference in secular matters. This will apply specially to foreign affairs, where the dangers of the present system are conspicuous. As for the practical manner of carrying out the reform, the idea seems to be that Tibet and Szchuan should be united into one administrative district and divided into three provinces, which would be called the Three Western Provinces, just as Manchuria is called the Three Eastern. Each province would have a Governor and the three would be under the control of a single Viceroy. Szchuan is an enormous district. It covers an area of 200,000 square miles and has a population of 60 millions. But the difficulty of establishing communications with it has always been supreme, and though only 1,500 miles by river from Shanghai, it might almost as well be 5,000. French and British railways from the direction of Annam and Burma are gradually creeping towards the frontier of the huge province, and it is probably the approach of these semi-political instruments that is causing uneasiness in Peking.

RUSSIA AND JAPAN.

A London telegram to the Jiji Shimpō says that Mr. Dillon, the well-known newspaper correspondent, has in the "Contemporary Review" an article in which he declares that things are progressing steadily and rapidly towards a Russo-Japanese agreement which will be of a far-reaching character, and the effects of which cannot fail to be felt in preventing the growth of the rapprochement between China and the United States. It is easy to conjecture many routes of arguments all leading to the conclusion formulated by Mr. Dillon, but to discuss his proposition without knowing exactly how he himself reaches it would be an idle task. Speaking broadly, however, we find it very difficult to believe in the correctness of Mr. Dillon's information about Russia and Japan.

CHINA.

Friday, June 24.

On the evening of the 22nd inst. the representatives of the agitation for the immediate opening of a national assembly in China, repaired to the palace of the Prince Regent, carrying petitions and seeking an audience. The Prince declined to meet them, but, as a matter of course, received the documents they carried. After their return from the palace, the representatives held a meeting and decided to establish in Peking an office where they might assemble periodically to consider the situation. Doubtless they have already determined on taking this step, for the telegram says that they were to hold their first meeting at the new office on the 23rd inst.

Saturday, June 25.

It is stated that the Chinese Government has recognized the necessity of having an official newspaper organ to educate the people's mind by way of preparation for constitutional institutions. An ex-official of Anhui has been chosen for editor, and the idea is to issue share capital to the extent of 300,000 taels. The paper is to be called Ta Tsin-pao (Great China News). It is expected that the first number of the paper will make its appearance in the autumn of this year.

Shanghai sends to the Hochi Shimbun a telegram said to have emanated from Peking to the effect that, according to a report received in the capital from the Governor of Kulon, 10,000 Russian troops have arrived in that place from Uriastai and are engaged in making observations. One would suppose that a body of 10,000 troops was as easy to move from place to place as a motor-car or a jinrikisha.

We find in the Tokyo Asahi a note to the effect that China is likely to gain her point with regard to the navigation of the Sungali river. The explanation given is that, sometime ago, when the question of Russia's waterway rights came upon the tapis, a committee was appointed in St. Petersburg to investigate the matter, and the decision arrived at was that while the Ussuli and the Amur possess special advantages from Russia's point of view, the uses of the Sungali to her are practically nil. Accordingly, an official intimation was made in Peking that Russia would not press her claim so far as the Sungali was concerned. She did not, however, adopt the precaution of seeking some equivalent concession elsewhere by way of exchange, and China, taking prompt advantage of this omission, promulgated the Sungali River Regulations, which became the subject of the recent controversy. If this account be correct, it will be seen that Russia's position is not very strong.

Sunday, June 26.

It is said to be expected in Peking that the Prince Regent will give audience to the representatives of the national assembly movement, and will speak them fair, not giving them any definite promise as to the fate of their proposal, but merely undertaking that all petitions sent in by the people on the subject shall be received and duly considered. This course is dictated by a desire to placate the nation without committing the Government to anything definite.

A very destructive fire is reported to have occurred at Hankow on the morning of the 25th inst. The conflagration had its origin on a coal barge lying in the river, and it spread thence to the city. Thirteen or fourteen vessels and 1,000 houses are said to have been reduced to ashes, and the loss has been heavy.

A terrible inundation is said have occurred at Changtieh, in the province of Hunan. Several hundreds of houses were swept away, and 2,000 people are reported to have lost their lives.

A steamer of the Mitsui Company named the Atago-yama has run on the Amherst rock on her way up the river to Shanghai. She received the assistance of a German war vessel, but the final result of the incident is not wired.

It is stated that the Peking Government has declined Germany's proposal to transfer to Berlin the seat of negotiations about Shantung problems, and has ordered the Governor of that province to repair to Peking for the purpose of making a minute report.

Monday, June 27.

The citizens of Canton appear to be strongly opposed to the Government's fiscal policy. It would seem that the programme of the local authorities is to interdict gambling and close the gambling shops, while to meet the resulting deficiency of revenue an additional tax is to be imposed upon salt. The citizens argue, however, that to put an end to gambling is out of the question, and that the proper course of the authorities is to treat it as an incurable vice, adopting whatever measures are proper for its control. They point out that the revenue derived from the proposed extra tax on salt would yield only 2 million taels annually, whereas the revenue accruing from gambling licences is fully seven million taels. Thus the Government proposes to make the people pay heavily for the prime necessary of food, in order to abolish a vice which cannot possibly be got rid of. A circular in the above sense is said to have been compiled by the leading merchants of Canton and forwarded to Peking.

Extraterritoriality was responsible for a great many untoward happenings in the past, and its roll of offences does not seem to be by any means exhausted. It is making trouble in Chientao. The Chinese police do not understand this strange system. They not unnaturally regard all Korean and Japanese subjects residing within Chinese limits as subject to the laws of China, and they proceed on that theory, the immediate result being several collisions between the Japanese and the Chinese police, and there has been loss of blood and even of life on both sides. A Japanese diplomatic official, quoted by the Asahi Shimbun, says that the trouble is due entirely to misconception on the part of the Chinese, and that it is imperative to impart to them an accurate knowledge of the sense and scope of extraterritorial jurisdiction; otherwise the present state of affairs may easily develop dangerous complications. History shows that when the boundaries of two States are continuous, local collisions are more or less inevitable, but these things are treated as trifles by the Central Governments. It is another thing, however, to willingly acquiesce in a state of affairs such as that existing in Chientao owing to Chinese misapprehensions.

Wednesday, June 29.

It seems like beating a dead horse to talk about the Sungali question now that China has yielded to Russia's contention. There is, however, a certain measure of geographical interest in the claim said to have been advanced by China. She is represented as having insisted that Russia's terminology is incorrect. Russia interprets the name Sungali, as used in the Aigun Treaty, in the sense of the upper reaches of the Amur River, whereas China alleges that there never was a Sungali known to Asia except the lower reaches of the Amur river namely the part now commonly called the "Amur." We have always heard that there was a considerable uncertainty about the exact meaning of the term "Sungali," but we did not suppose that such a radical difference existed as the Chinese claim would imply. However the question has now no political importance. The Chinese Government has acted wisely, and it remains to be seen whether the privilege now recognized will be extended to the ships of all nations.

It appears that there has existed for some time, though not in a very conspicuous manner, a bank of China and Japan called the Changlung Bank. It has its principal place of business in Newchwang, with branches at Dairen and Mukden. The Bank is now attracting a measure of public attention, owing to a scheme for largely increasing its capital. What the old figure has been and what the new will be, we have as yet no information, but the telegraph states that the Governor-General has guaranteed 6 per cent. upon the increased capital. Of course this has created an eager demand for the new shares. It appears to us that such an arrangement is calculated to interfere more or less with the operations of the Specie Bank, which recently extended its field of business largely in Manchuria, but probably the information published by Tokyo journals is incomplete.

The bandits in Manchuria are again en evidence. A party of them made their appearance in the valley of the Weimen River on the 12th ult., and destroyed by fire a quantity of Russian railway materials valued at 160,000 taels. The number of the bandits is not stated, neither does it appear that they obtained any booty. It would seem that their object was destruction. The Russians immediately despatched a military force to the place and the Chinese followed suit, but the bandits appear to have escaped before either body of troops arrived. The telegram adds that the Russian force is to remain in the neighbourhood until the Chinese have afforded clear indications of their ability to preserve order. That sounds as though the Russian troops are likely to be on the ground for an indefinite period.

Shanghai appears to be in the vortex of a rubber mania. The telegraph says that owing to the rapid appreciation of that, staple, settling day found many of the brokers in serious difficulties. Only three men were able to meet their obligations squarely and an interval of three days had to be allowed to the others for the purposes of a settlement. It is said that so many speculators have sold for a fall that no less than 17 million taels have now to be put up as margin money. That this rubber bubble will burst sooner or later may be confidently inferred from the history of all such incidents, and indeed there have already been signs of the beginning of the end. Our sympathies, therefore, are with the Shanghai sellers.

Thursday, June 30.

An incident has happened in China which wears a particularly heinous aspect in Chinese eyes. Thieves have broken into a store-house attached to the Empress Dowager's tomb, and have stolen a quantity of gold and silver utensils. The objects removed are said to have consisted of six kinds, but either the total number or the value is stated. Of course a very wide chain of responsibility is involved, and many officials have either been punished or handed over to the Board of Punishments. The Chinese are such remarkable burglars that the theft may very well have been committed without any connivance whatever on the part of the officials.

A telegram says that a company has been formed in Kilin with a capital of a million taels, one-half of which has been put up by the wealthy Shanghai merchant, Mr. Wu. The membership is to consist of officials as well as private individuals, and three objects are contemplated, namely, to exploit the mineral and lumber resources of Chientao, to provide means of transport on the Tumen river, and to lay a light line of rail between Hunchun, near the Russo-Korean boundary, and Kilin.

THE CHINESE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

Our readers are aware that the Peking Government decided to hold a council at the Palace on the 27th ult. for the purpose of debating the national-assembly proposal. In order to ensure unanimity at this council a preliminary meeting of high dignitaries of State was held on the 26th, when the opinions of those attending were found to take three forms. One view supported by Prince Su and Mr. Tsai Tse, Minister of Finance, was in favour of granting the delegates' petition and opening an assembly at once. A second view insisted that no change should be made in the programme already formally announced. The third opinion took the shape of compromise, namely, a shortening of the period of probation for convening an assembly. This last course is said to have obtained the support of two thirds of those present at the meeting. But when the Palace Council was held on the following day, it transpired that the preliminary meeting had been little more than a formality. The Prince Regent had evidently been determined all along to adhere to the original programme, and not to shorten the period of probation in any degree whatever. The telegraph does not say how far the Council supported or opposed that view, but at all events the outcome of the meeting was that an Imperial rescript was promulgated on the same day distinctly refusing to entertain the petitioners' request. The rescript set out by recalling the fact that when a similar petition had been presented on previous occasions, the Throne had replied that the Government's resolve was to allow a full period of nine years to be devoted to purposes of preparation and development before opening a national assembly. It went on to urge that the people of the Empire should not allow themselves to be influenced by a mere name, but should abide by the set purpose of administration. Further, the Throne had taken the precaution of dispatching delegates to the provinces to investigate the state of local preparation, and had that day convened a council of high dignitaries, and the result of the investigation and of the council had been unfavourable to the view taken by the petitioners. The ruling Sovereign as the repository of his predecessor's wishes, and in obedience to his own desire to consult the best interests of the nation, was only too desirous of convening a national assembly, but the question of readiness or unreadiness was of paramount importance, and to ignore it might endanger the whole success of the proposed system. A national assembly constituted only one part of the administrative machine, and its convocation could not alone achieve anything towards promoting the peace and prosperity of the nation. Moreover, the immense area of the Chinese Empire had to be considered as well as the difficulty of financing it under the disturbed condition too often manifested. The people, however, could not doubt the earnest solicitude of the Throne for their welfare, and they must remember that the Tsucheng-yuan is to be convened this year in Peking and that it will be a real preliminary to constitutional government. The rescript ended by calling upon the people to patiently await the conclusion of the originally fixed term of nine years, and to refrain from sending in any more petitions on this subject.

It is impossible not to feel that the Prince Regent has taken the wisest course in this matter. For such a stupendous change as the establishment of a constitutional Government in China nine years seems all too short a period of preparation, and as to abbreviating that period by no less than seven full years the idea seems quite extravagant. With regard to the petitioners assembled in Peking, they are said not to be at all discouraged, but it is probable that calmer councils will prevail in the end. We note that a Chinese subject, interviewed by a representative of the Asahi Shinbun, distinguishes between the second petition and the first on the ground that whereas the latter asked for the immediate opening of an assembly, the former sought merely some abbreviation of the probationary period. We cannot reconcile this statement with the messages received direct from Peking during the past fortnight. These messages invariably spoke of sohkai, which can be interpreted only as meaning "immediate opening." The Asahi's informant thinks that repeated petitions may have the effect of ultimately shortening the period by perhaps two years.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL MOVEMENT IN CHINA.

On the 27th ult. a Palace council was to be held in Peking for the purpose of discussing the question of the immediate opening of the national assembly, and naturally public interest was keenly excited. The agitators from the provinces were said to be leaving no stone unturned to promote their cause. Parties of them were going about seeking interviews with Princes, men of title and Ministers of State, whom they were endeavouring to win to their views. It is rumoured that something like a wave of opinion has been developed in connection with this matter. Certain influential persons are taking the view that the needs of the Treasury, especially in the matter of furnishing the country with adequate military and naval forces, cannot be satisfied in any way except by obtaining supplies from the people's representatives assembled in national convocation. Hence these publicists may be classed as approving the programme for the immediate opening of a national assembly. Altogether the Prince Regent and his advisers are brought face to face with a problem of immense difficulty. In matters of politics it is easy to give away, but almost impossible to take back. Once the Crown divests itself of the power of the purse and of legislation, it can never recall those concessions. But that China is really ready for a national assembly, in the ordinary acceptance of the term "ready," it is almost impossible to persuade oneself. Still the question seems to be resolved into a choice between two evils, namely, the continuance of conditions which represent national incompetence or the adoption of a wholesale change for which the people cannot be supposed to be prepared.

NIKKO.

Nikko, of course, would not be Nikko without its rain. To the wealth of moisture which favours that region must be ascribed its transformation from the volcanic barrenness of the past to the luxuriant verdure of to-day. And, as in the climatically much-abused England, when it is fine, there is no excelling the crystal clearness of the atmosphere and the brilliant green of the landscape. Nikko, apart from the treasures of art which its temples contain, is an asset of solid value to Japan, and no effort should be spared to maintain its beauty unimpaired. In this context, it seems a debatable point whether the proposed scheme to connect Lake Chuzenji with the Kegon Fall by means of a subterranean aqueduct—and incidentally to benefit the Ashio Mine Company—will adversely affect the natural charms of the district or not. While it is evident, from the interesting article on this subject which appeared in our issue of Saturday last, that every care would be taken to avoid the marring of the Kegon Fall—one of Japan's scenic treasures—it seems more than probable, as a correspondent points out, that the level of water in Lake Chuzenji would be lowered, to the great detriment of the dwellers on its shores, not to mention the injury to the appearance of the lake. It seems to us that this is clearly a case for expert investigation, and if the natural attractions of the district are likely to be compromised in any way, the scheme should not be suffered to mature. Meanwhile, we may remark, the hotel accommodation in this charming district—a most important consideration, in view of the continually increasing number of visitors—is being maintained, if possible, at an even higher standard than before. It is a noteworthy fact that the two hotels conceded by travellers to be unsurpassed in Japan—the Kanaya, at Nikko, and the Fujiya at Miyanoshita—have now come under the same proprietorship and are conducted on the same generally excellent lines. Hotel-keepers throughout Japan may well take a leaf out of Messrs. Kanaya's book.

A conference took place on Wednesday between the Premier, the War Minister, the Home Minister, the Minister of Communications, and General Sakuma, Governor-General of Formosa. The future of Japan's colonial policy is said to have been discussed at the meeting.

OPIMUM.

The sincere attempts of the British and Chinese Governments to put a stop to the opium habit in China are meeting with difficulties. A long telegram from Peking to the Asahi Shimbun explains the situation. It was originally agreed that the Chinese Authorities should take steps to put a stop to the planting of opium, and that these steps should be thoroughly efficient within the space of three years. On the other hand, the import of opium from India was to be reduced at the rate of 10 per cent. annually, so that it would cease altogether in ten years. One contingency, however, seems not to have received sufficient attention, namely, that a diminution of supply from recognized sources would not be accompanied by a diminution of demand, and therefore new sources of supply might be found. That is what appears to have happened. Both China and England carried out their share of the agreement with all good faith, but they were of course unable to check the craving for the drug, and the consequence was that keen competition was developed among buyers, so that the price of the drug rose in two or three years from 600 to 700 per cent. This meant, of course, that the Indian growers lost nothing by being obliged to limit their export; on the contrary, they found themselves heavy gainers. But with opium at such a price, supplies began to arrive secretly from Persia, Turkey and the Philippines, so that the situation threatened to become worse instead of better. In these circumstances the British Government is said to have proposed to China the conclusion of a convention strictly limiting the sources of supply and empowering the Chinese Authorities to adopt preventive measures in the case of all opium imported from outside quarters. This matter is under discussion in Peking.

The news from Peking about the opium complication is decidedly perplexing. Apparently the Waiwupu has distinctly declined to entertain England's proposals. Nevertheless those proposals appear to have been eminently just and reasonable. The original agreement between Great Britain and China was that the supply of opium from India should be reduced by 10 per cent. every year, and that the growth of the poppy in China should be subjected to cognate restraint. England set about giving effect to this arrangement conscientiously and accurately, but the Chinese local satraps, whether because of genuine antipathy to the vice, or for the purpose of displaying their own prowess put an end to poppy growing with much greater haste than the above agreement contemplated. Neither England nor China, however, could control the craving of the opium-eater, and a decrease of supply without a corresponding diminution of demand, resulted in an enormous enhancement of price, so that opium began to be imported from various quarters other than India. It is said that 100,000 lbs. of the drug reached China from foreign countries during the past year. England therefore asks that some steps shall be taken to control this unexpected import. Nothing can be more reasonable than this demand. But China is said to have refused. We hesitate to believe this, inasmuch as it would place

China palpably in the wrong and, as a rule, her foreign policy is not marked by any displays of unreason.

THE MUKDEN-ANTUNG QUESTION.

It is stated that the troublesome problem of acquiring land for the construction of the Mukden Antung line has been satisfactorily solved. The whole of the necessary land has been purchased and the money paid over, with the exception of a distance of about 25 miles, through which the exact route of the line has not yet been fixed. It is not anticipated that any difficulty will be encountered with regard to this remaining region. At one time appearances seemed to indicate that the acquisition of the railway-lands might prove very difficult. A word from the Chinese local authorities would have induced, on the part of the proprietors, a mood which must have given great trouble to the Japanese. But the Chinese officials seem to have behaved with much loyalty, and corresponding credit is due to them.

The Mukden correspondent of the Asahi Shimbun sends to that journal a very reassuring telegram. He represents the Chinese authorities as having recognized the fruitlessness of the policy hitherto pursued by them in the matter of policing the Mukden-Antung line. Their original idea in placing a police force within the zone of this railway was to demonstrate their competence to preserve peace and order, and thus practically to assert their claim for the withdrawal of the Japanese railway guards. But this object has not been attained, nor is there any reasonable prospect of attaining it. The only result has been that collisions have occurred between the police of the two countries, thus endangering international relations fruitlessly. The correspondent represents the Chinese authorities as having become sensible of these facts and also of the costliness of maintaining a force of railway police. Therefore they have decided to withdraw the latter.

Some time ago we published the gist of a convention concluded by the Viceroy of Manchuria and Mr. Consul-General Koike, with the intention of putting a stop to the frequent disputes that arise between Japanese and Chinese police within the zones of the Mukden-Antung Railway. It would seem, however, that this convention has not proved of much service. The friction has continued just as before, and several collisions have occurred, in which the aggressive disposition is said to have been shown on China's side mainly. The Viceroy is reported to be much distressed about this state of affairs, since not only does it tend to impair friendly relations, but also it handicaps China when any controversy arises. His Excellency is alleged to be of opinion that the fault lies with the management of the Chinese police officials, and he has given orders for their replacement by more competent men.

THE SOCIETY OF AMERICAN FRIENDS.

The American Friends' Society held a meeting on Tuesday evening in Tokyo, when some interesting speeches were delivered, Mr. Takahashi Tetsuo, who has just returned from the United States after a residence of 17 years, described the so-called anti-Japanese feeling in America as confined to a very petty section of people who have their own ends to serve by such agitation. What was written in the newspapers might have some influence on uneducated folks, but it was fully discounted by the better classes. In fact, according to Mr. Takahashi, it cannot be said that there is any cloud upon the horizon of the two countries' relations.

Mr. Odagiri, formerly Japanese Consul-General in Shanghai, who resigned that position for the purpose of joining the staff of the Specie Bank in Yingkow was also present at the dinner, having just returned from a trip round the world. He made a speech which did not tally with the reassuring tone of Mr. Takahashi's analysis. The views of the ex-Consul-General are that the question between Japan and the United States does not depend simply upon reason. If it did, a comfortable solution might be confidently reckoned on. But the truth is that there stands between the two nations a problem which arises out of the economic condition of the United States. America's capital has grown to exceed her domestic opportunities for employing it. She must go abroad in search of new avenues, and it was owing to the pressure of that necessity that her Secretary of State recently formulated the neutralization project in Manchuria, with its corollary of railway building. That has been called America's "dollar policy," and the term is not inapt. The President himself has urged his country's capitalists to look for over-sea investments, and has promised that his Government would not hesitate to support American citizens in any complications that might arise out of such a policy. That then was the impulse inspiring America's outstretched hand, and, thus considered, the question might prove difficult of solution.

ANOTHER EXAMPLE.

The Japan Gazette's splendid allegiance to the dictates of truth and fairplay when there is question of attacking the Japan Mail is proverbial. One of its set phrases is that the Japan Mail "abuses the Foreign Community," or "attacks the Foreign Community" or "libels the Foreign Community"; any and everyone of which charges is absolutely without foundation, as the Japan Gazette well knows. They serve, however, to mislead superficial readers, and it is to such only that our ingenuous contemporary can hope to appeal. A recent example of suppressio veri on the part of that notorious journal is characteristic. It quotes from our columns a part of a paragraph relating to the tariff and endeavours to prove that we therein charged the local foreign merchants with perfunctoriness. To accomplish this feat it was necessary to go to the length of omitting a part of what we wrote. But that did not over-tax the courage of the Japan Gazette. It quietly left out the whole of the following:—

Thus in one way or another they (the foreign merchants) may possibly appear to have acted tardily, but we may be pretty sure that nothing of energy or celerity was really wanting on their side.

It is in truth supremely comical to find a journal which is habitually guilty of such schemes undertaking to teach "the elementary rules of newspaper correspondence," and to insist on just representation of adverse views; a journal which never itself refers to adverse views except to pervert or to distort them.

JAPANESE EMIGRATION.

An anonymous official makes some pertinent remarks in the columns of the Hochi Shimbun. He says that undoubtedly North America is closed to Japanese immigrants for political reasons, but South America offers a splendid field. In Peru a daily labourer has no difficulty in earning 1 yen 20 sen, and in Brazil enormous tracts of country remain to be reclaimed. The unfortunate incidents which have occasionally happened in the past are attributable, not to defective opportunities but to faulty arrangements on the part of the Emigration Companies. These allow themselves to be swayed by considerations of temporary gain. They take any one that comes along and they make no attempt to explain the conditions that have to be encountered on the other side. The consequence is that persons wholly unsuited are embarked. This official contends for the exercise of much greater care on the part of the companies, and he is also in favour of closer Government supervision and more generous official encouragement.

With reference to Count Komura's declared policy of encouraging the settlement of Japanese in neighbouring Oriental countries instead of allowing them to scatter indiscriminately over the face of the globe, steps have been taken by the Authorities to encourage the former result, the most important of those steps being the organization of the Colonial Bureau. Thus far no very signal results can be recorded. The following tables show the number of Japanese settled in Korea and Manchuria respective:—

THE JAPANESE TOURISTS.

The Japanese tourists arrived at Hangchow on the morning of the 23rd ult. and left on the following day for Shanghai, where the majority of them will embark on the Awa Maru for Japan.

Telegrams say that the Japanese businessmen now on tour in China have reached Fuchow and were well received there. They are to proceed next to Hanchow, and presumably they will thereafter embark for Japan.

HARBIN.

Very strenuous investigations are said to have commenced in Harbin with the object of discovering whether numerous frauds were not committed by officials of the Russian Railway acting in conjunction with merchants. Domiciliary visits have been paid to several of the suspected persons, and the telegram says that considerable alarm has been created. It seems very late in the day to undertake such investigations, but as history does not contain any instance of a war which was conducted with perfectly pure hands by all concerned, we presume that Russian officials were no exception.

A party of 150 bandits are reported to have burned a store containing charcoal and fire-wood at a place called Imienpo. The storehouse was the property of a Russian merchant in Harbin and the losses are put at 200,000 roubles.

On the 25th ult. at 1 a.m. as the Colonel-in-Command of the Harbin Garrison was driving back from a theatre in a jinrikisha, he was set upon by a party of ruffians, who fired 20 shots at him, but happily not one of the bullets reached its mark. The Colonel sustained some injury, however, to one of his legs. It is said to be believed that the assault was not of a political character, but was merely dictated by motives of revenge.

A strange incident is reported from a place on the Russo-Chinese frontier, the name of which is quite undecipherable in its transliterated form. The facts given are that the Russian police having effected the arrest of some Chinese tradesmen suspected of smuggling goods across the frontier, a party of Chinese police came to the rescue, and were not beaten off until several casualties had occurred on both sides. The Chinese showing a disposition to renew the struggle, 40 Cossacks were ordered up as a precautionary measure. The whole description is very vague.

THE KEIHIN CANAL.

There is every prospect of this interesting work being officially sanctioned. It has received the approval of the Tokyo and Yokohama Municipal Authorities, and nothing now remains except to obtain the assent of the Home Department.

It appears that the scheme for constructing a canal between Tokyo and Yokohama is encountering considerable opposition. A few days ago a statement was published to the effect that all the necessary preliminaries had been completed, and that the work would soon be commenced. But it is now alleged that the object of the projectors is, not to provide means of communication, but rather to make money by reclaiming land. A large part of the foreshore between Kanagawa and Shinagawa produces a copious crop of edible sea-weed, and the gatherers of this staple are apprehensive that Mr. Okada's scheme might interfere with their industry. They have consequently organized strong opposition. Then again the Tokyo Municipal Authorities are said to be insisting that the charter must contain a clause providing for the removal or alteration of the canal at the expense of the company, should any inconvenience be experienced in constructing the proposed Tokyo Harbour. Altogether the prospect of the enterprise looks anything but bright.

HONGKONG.

The jinrikisha men of Hongkong to the number of 1,500 have gone on strike by way of protest against the schedule of fares issued by the Colonial Government. The streets are said to present a deserted appearance. If these coolies have followed the example of their Japanese confrères we sympathize heartily with the action of the Colonial Government. In Tokyo fares have more than doubled during the past five years. One would suppose that the jinrikisha men of the capital, confronted by the competition of the tram-cars and the motor cars, would have done as people generally do in a competition, namely, lowered their charges. But instead of doing so, they have raised their demands to such an exorbitant figure that everyone is beginning to shrink from employing a kuruma. We wish that this could be regarded as the beginning of the end, but it is to be feared that the life of the jinrikisha will be a very long one. We understand that in Tokyo, as in Yokohama, kuruma-drawers are required to carry schedules of fares and to show them to their employers if required to do so. But naturally these schedules are printed in Japanese, so that they can be of very little aid to foreigners; and for the rest, neither a foreigner nor a Japanese would hesitate to spend 20 or 30 sen extra for the sake of avoiding the trouble of inspecting a schedule in the street, and seeking police enforcement of its figures. One thing is certain, however, namely, that the jinrikisha-men are enriching themselves at their country's expense, for owing to their exactions and those of inn-keepers, touring in Japan is becoming an impossibility.

THE HYPOTHEC BANK'S DEBENTURES.

It was recently announced that the Hypothec Bank would issue debentures to the extent of 10 million yen, carrying interest at the rate of 5 per cent., and having a selling price of 95. This announcement produced something like consternation in financial circles, the terms being so much easier than those of the Government's conversion scheme, and it was confidently predicted that the debentures would be subscribed many times over. Such has not proved to be the case, however. The issue commenced on the 20th ult., and according to appearances up to the evening of the 23rd, the amount subscribed will not exceed 12 millions.

The list for subscriptions to the Hypothec Bank's debentures closed on the 27th ult., and the applications received in Tokyo up to that time totalled 12,400,000 yen. It is therefore expected that when the provincial applications have been received a total of 20 millions will be reached. That is spoken of as a striking result, but truly it does not present itself to us in that light. The securities in question carry 5 per cent. interest and are purchasable at 95, while on the other hand, money is said to be a drug in the market. Nevertheless guilt-edged securities are subscribed only twice over.

Up to the 29th ult. the applications for these debentures had reached a total of 25,775,000 yen, and it is expected that when all the returns have been obtained the aggregate will be about 30 millions.

PREJUDICE.

As a really singular example of the extremes to which prejudice can push a critic, we venture to invite our readers' attention to the following:—

LAND OWNERSHIP BY FOREIGNERS IN JAPAN.
(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

Tokyo, March 24.

At the very close of its Session, the House of Peers in Tokyo passed a Bill extending to foreigners the privilege of owning land in Japan. This question may be said to have been before the public during the past 30 years. On the side of Japanese officialdom there never was any rooted objection to making the concession. Count Inouye, when he essayed to solve the problem of treaty revision in 1885 by offering to open the country fully, did not think of reserving the right of land-ownership, and when Count Okuma approached the same task in 1889 his views were not less liberal. Moreover there can be little doubt that in Count Inouye's time the nation would have acquiesced. But when Count Okuma commenced his negotiations, the opening of a National Assembly was in plain sight and public opinion had developed new activity.

Two ideas prevailed. One was inspired by international nervousness. A vague fear existed that were foreigners permitted to own land, their limitless command of cheap capital would enable them to buy up huge tracts and absorb the whole of the unearned increment—an increment which could not fail to be considerable in a rapidly developing country like Japan. The other idea was that the best method of achieving revision of the treaties consisted in rendering the old Conventions intolerable by enforcing their restrictions.

Naturally the foreign residents had not been content to remain, year after year, confined within the narrow limits fixed by the treaties when delightful retreats on the sea-shore or in the mountains offered everywhere, and when the conventional restrictions could easily be evaded by purchasing land and registering it in the name of a trusty Japanese clerk or, perhaps, of a "house-keeper." Estates acquired in that manner still exist, and they were comparatively numerous when Japanese politicians conceived the plan of strictly enforcing the treaties. Of course no practical restraint, retrospective or prospective, could be imposed; but from such agitation to a general inference that foreign ownership of land ought to be opposed on patriotic principles the interval was short, and undoubtedly the "strict enforcement" movement contributed materially to foster popular prejudice. At all events the privilege of land ownership had to be omitted from the revised treaties. The Government, on its side, sought to ease the situation for foreigners by instituting the system of "superficies," and by enacting that a "juridical person" registered in Japan might become a land-owner. These measures meant that an individual foreigner could obtain a right of land tenure for any fixed term, however long, and that two or more foreigners, combining to form a juridical person for the purpose of some commercial or industrial enterprise, might become owners of land in fee simple. Still, the final restriction remained to be withdrawn, and not until the 26th Session of the Diet did Japanese statesmen judge that the time for withdrawing that restriction had fully come.

THE DIET AND THE GOVERNMENT BILL.

Events proved that they had not delayed a moment too long. The Bill drafted by them for presentation to the House of Representatives was of the simplest description. It may be summed up in a dozen words—the privilege of owning land in Japan except in Saghalien, Formosa, and Hokkaido, or within a fortified zone, should be granted to the subjects or citizens of every State which extended a similar privilege to Japanese subjects. But the House of Representatives was not prepared to go so far. A majority of the members showed themselves still obsessed by the old apprehension that foreign capitalists might employ agents to buy up large tracts in Japan, with a view to the unearned increment and without taking any active interest in the country's welfare. They therefore amended the Bill in the sense that a foreign owner of land in Japan must have, if an individual, a domicile or a place of residence in the Empire, and if a juridical person, a place of business; that a foreign juridical person, before acquiring land, must obtain the sanction of the Minister of State for Home Affairs, whereas no such sanction would be necessary in the case of a Japanese juridical person; and that a landowner losing his legal qualifications must make some disposition of his estate within five years. Thus altered the Bill went to the Upper House, was passed without further change, and will doubtless be soon promulgated, though it is not to go into operation until the new treaties have been negotiated.

The amendments serve chiefly to indicate that the Japanese nation has still some sense of timidity in the presence of the Occidental capitalist. Of course the residential condition has no practical value. A man may have a place of residence without residing there. But the provision that an estate which ceases to be lawfully ownable must be disposed of within five years distinctly impairs the value of the concession. The Government is understood to regard the measure as a first step only, but Japan's friends would have liked to see the Diet more liberal and courageous.—The Times.

Upon the above letter the Japan Chronicle, with full endorsement of the Japan Gazette, comments in the following extraordinary strain:—

"One of the measures introduced by the Government and passed by the Diet in the last session, avowedly in connection with the impending revision of the treaties, was that of the grant to foreigners of the right of land ownership. A more unsatisfactory or illiberal measure, granting rights with one hand that are taken away with the other, was surely never devised. Yet the Tokyo correspondent of The Times, who gives an account of the new law in a letter to that journal, does not apparently see any of its imperfections, or if so he is so cautious in indicating them that his criticism amounts almost to commendation. The measure is presented to English readers as a fine concession to foreigners, somewhat against the wishes of the Diet and the people generally, made by the enlightened Japanese Government, which has always been in its favour. Consequently when it comes to the question of the negotiation of a new treaty the Japanese plenipotentiary will be able to point to the impartial opinion of the correspondent of The Times at Tokyo as evidence that on the land question at least the Japanese Government is and always has been in favour of extending to aliens in Japan the treatment Japanese receive in foreign countries. No doubt on the present occasion the British representative will be better informed, and will be aware what a very meagre concession has been made, but the majority of English readers who peruse the article will obtain the impression that in the matter of land ownership the Japanese under the careful guidance of the Government have finally abandoned the illiberal policy which has been in force for so many years."

Truly there is only one inference possible, namely, that the Japan Chronicle and the Japan Gazette trusted to the chance that few of their readers would see the letter in The Times, and, so trusting, allowed themselves to be betrayed into the above extravagant criticism. We are sorry to disturb their calculations by publishing the letter.

AN IMPORTANT PROJECT.

San Francisco telegraphs to the Mainichi Dempo that the Directors of the Pacific Mail S.S. Co. have decided to build two steamers of 38,000 tons each, costing 6 million dollars for the two. These vessels are to compete with all the steam-ship services now existing on the Pacific, including those of Messrs. Hill and Hariman.

The idea of the great Company is to obtain full command of the Pacific and to induce the Government to grant a substantial subsidy. The difficulty connected with these monster steamers is that very few ports in the Far East are capable of accommodating them, and that very seldom indeed can a full cargo be got together within a suitable period. In our opinion ships under foreign management are greatly handicapped when they attempt to compete with Japanese vessels in the over-sea carrying trade of Japan. The Japanese vessels always work hand in hand with agencies which provide facilities for the carriage of goods to and from the interior. In the present state of affairs no such facilities can be afforded by foreign companies,

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

The first decennial period of the Educational Department's programme with regard to Technical Schools was brought to a conclusion last year, and the question has now to be decided what policy will be adopted in mapping out the procedure for the next 10 years. The prevailing idea seems to be that the number of schools devoted to instruction in industrial affairs, marine products, mercantile-marine business and forestry should be augmented, but that the general policy should be directed to expanding the present schools rather than to extending their number. The equipment of a school costs nearly as much as its building, and therefore it pays better to increase the accommodation at an existing school than to erect a new one. Tables are published showing the numbers of schools and students respectively, at the close of last year. They are as follow:—

		Number of Students.
Agricultural Schools	168	19,266
Commercial Schools	77	22,781
Industrial Schools	38	7,258
Marine Products Schools	14	1,095
Mercantile Marine Schools	10	2,264
Apprentice Schools	76	6,306
Total	383	58,970

In addition to the above there are a number of schools for preparing students to enter the above institutions. They are tabulated as follow:—

Agricultural	4,407	163,309
Commercial	190	12,714
Industrial	227	13,164
Marine Products	94	2,931
Mercantile Marine	1	30
Apprentice	—	—
Total	4,919	192,148

There are also three normal technical schools where 173 students are qualifying to become teachers.

THE "MANSHU SHIMPO."

We read in the Jiji Shimpō and in the other Tokyo journals that some indignation has been caused in Manchuria by measures on the part of the Authorities which resulted in the discontinuance of a Japanese journal called the Manshu Shimpō, which has hitherto been issued in Manchuria, as its name implies. Our readers will observe that we used a somewhat roundabout phrase in describing the event, but we do so simply because that is the form of speech adopted by our Tokyo contemporaries. They do not say that the newspaper was "suspended" or "abolished," but merely "induced to abandon publication." The cause assigned is unceasing attacks upon the management of the South Manchuria Railway. These attacks had reached the number of about 100 before any step was taken by the Authorities. Nevertheless there is an outcry that freedom of speech does not exist in Manchuria. It is a curious idiosyncrasy of the age that freedom of speech is the only privilege whose enjoyment is practically held to be above all control. Abuse the privilege however you will; pervert it to whatever order-injuring and peace-disturbing purposes you please, still it remains freedom of speech; and so long as it goes by that name folks will be found to defend it against all interference.

DEATH OF MR. MITSUHASHI.

With sincere regret we announce the death of Mr. Mitsuhashi Nobukata, Mayor of Yokohama, which took place on Saturday, the 25th, at 5.30 p.m. Mr. Mitsuhashi had been ill for a considerable time, and there had been much diversity of opinion as to the nature of his malady. But it was finally diagnosed to be cancer of the lungs, and after some weeks of great pain death must have come as a relief rather than as a misfortune. Mr. Mitsuhashi was born in 1856, and he early distinguished himself by his linguistic capacity, his knowledge of English being so accurate that very few of his countrymen could equal him in writing and speaking that language. The earliest years of his official life were spent in the Public Works Department, and during that time he established relations with the Japan Times, then under the editorship of Mr. Charles Rickerby; he did some excellent work for that journal and subsequently for the Japan Mail, but in 1879 he entered the Foreign Office, and naturally his connection with journals then ceased. In 1881, however, he was transferred to Kanagawa prefecture and then became able to continue his work for the columns of this journal, to which he contributed many admirable translations of important laws and ordinances. In the year 1900, after some time of renewed service in the Foreign Office, he was promoted to be Minister Resident and accredited to Holland. From that position he retired in 1906 to accept the post of Mayor at Yokohama, where he won universal esteem and friendship by his just and tactful methods. In the ordinary course of events a long period of usefulness ought still to have been before him, but fate willed otherwise. We bid him farewell with deep sorrow.

During 1894, when the late Mayor Mr. Mitsuhashi held the position of Secretary of Kanagawa prefecture, a part of the breakwater which was being constructed at that time gave way, and in consequence he was put on the retired list. In connection with this affair, he has left a written statement in which he refers to the dishonourable rumour circulated at that time of his having received a bribe. His statement says that he sacrificed himself on the occasion for the passage of the supplementary estimates amounting to some 800,000 yen for repairing expenses.

The funeral rites of the late Mayor, Mr. N. Mitsuhashi, took place on Thursday at the Zotokuji Temple, Moto-machi. The religious service commenced at 3 p.m. when solemn Japanese music was played. The head priest of the temple of the Mitsuhashi family read an address of condolence, which was followed by religious ceremonies performed by the presiding priest. Subsequently Baron Sufu, Governor of Kanagawa prefecture, read his own address of condolence, praising the achievements of the late Mayor during his tenure of office, and lamenting his untimely death. The Baron also read an address from Marquis Matsukata, President of the Japan Red Cross Society. Then the following address of condolence was read by the German Consul-General, Herr F. von Syburg, on behalf of the Yokohama Consular Body:—

"On behalf of the Consular Body at Yokohama it devolves upon me to give expression to the sincere sorrow felt by myself and my colleagues at the loss of so worthy a representative of all that is the best in the type of the true Japanese gentleman. Of his public career as an official in the various grades through which he worked his way up till he reached the position of a diplomatic representative of his Government in Europe there is no need for me to speak. The honours thus successively conferred on him by his official superiors are a sufficiently eloquent testimony to the very high esteem in which his character and abilities were held by those best to judge of them. But it was when at the call of duty and good citizenship he laid aside the dignity of his diplomatic post to accept the mayoralty of Yokohama, that we foreigners had the best opportunities of judging how well he was worthy of the confidence reposed in him by the people of Yokohama. By his actions, no less than by his words, he showed how desirable he deemed it that the foreigners resident in the port should be allowed to coöperate with their Japanese fellow-residents in all matters affecting the public welfare and interests of this important centre of trade. The late Mr. Mitsuhashi was at once a true Japanese patriot and a friend to the foreigners who had the privilege of knowing him. It is with unfeigned sorrow that we offer our sincere condolence to his family and his fellow citizens."

The above address was followed by those offered by Mr. Saito, acting Mayor of the city, and Mr. Kaneko, President of the Kanagawa Prefectural Assembly.

Mr. D. H. Blake, Chairman of the Yokohama Foreign Board of Trade, then read an address of condolence on behalf of the Foreign Board of Trade, couched in these terms:—

"We are assembled here to-day to pay our last tribute of respect to a departed friend, and it is my sad privilege, on behalf of the Yokohama Foreign Board of Trade, which organization represents such a large proportion of the foreign residents of this city, to give expression to the feelings of sorrow and sympathy which we entertain on this solemn occasion. Mr. Mitsuhashi Nobukata has had an exceptional career, so far as concerns his relations with foreigners in Japan. He has been more or less associated with them for a period of thirty years, and during that time the friendships he has made have strengthened and increased with each succeeding year. His personality was such as to inspire confidence, and to command respect and admiration from all those who had the honour of his acquaintance. In his public life he combined all the qualities which are essential to a successful career, and he possessed the happy and unusual faculty of attaining his legitimate ends without sacrificing the rights and feelings of others. He deserves well of his country and of his countrymen, as he has served them faithfully and with distinction, both at home and abroad, and it is not too much to hope for or to expect that he will be remembered in the years to come as one whose example is worthy of emulation. It has been said that "Sorrow makes the whole world kin," so realizing and believing in the force of this time-honoured adage, we have gathered here with our Japanese friends to join with them in bidding farewell to the mortal remains of one whom in life we honoured and respected and in death whose memory we shall cherish. To his family we offer our profound sympathy in the sad hour of their bereavement, and to his colleagues in office and to the citizens of Yokohama generally, we tender our most respectful condolences in the great loss which they have sustained."

On the conclusion of the addresses the priests chanted the Buddhist scriptures, while members of the Mitsuhashi family and others attending the religious service burned incense in turn, proceeding before the tablet of the deceased. The function closed at 3.40 p.m. Over 800 persons attended the religious service. The company included some fifty foreigners, comprising the Consuls of the different Powers and representatives of many foreign firms. Several European ladies and a few Chinese gentlemen were among the audience. The principal Japanese present were the officials of the Kencho and the City Office, as well as the members of the Prefectural and Municipal Assemblies and the Chamber of Commerce.

THE OVERHEAD RAILWAY.

On the 25th ult. the section of the overhead railway in Tokyo, from Yurakucho to Karasumoricho was opened to traffic. Passengers are thus enabled to travel from Yurakucho to Ueno by this line, but to do so they have to make a wide circuit via Meguro and Shinjuku. The scale of fares fixed by the railway authorities is interesting. The distance from Yurakucho to Shinagawa can be travelled for 4 sen, and within that distance there are two intermediate fares of 2 sen and 3 sen. From Shinagawa to Meguro an addition of 2 sen is charged, and from Meguro to Shinjuku an additional 4 sen, after which a 10 sen ticket carries the traveller all the way round to Ueno. The portion of this line which actually consists of overhead railway is from Yurakucho to Hamamatsucho. This overhead railway was planned in 1896, under the guidance of a German engineer, but work was not commenced until the year 1900, and thereafter a serious interruption was caused by the war. In 1906 the building was resumed and, as stated above, the southern section has now been completed. The line is supported throughout on brick arches. The road bed is 19 feet above the streets and the width of the track is 51 feet.

Of course the cost has been very great. Taking everything into consideration the money expended is said to have averaged 60 yen per foot, and the total outlay on the above section has been 5 million yen.

A central station has to be built at Yurakucho, and a principal station at Karasumoricho. When the Karasumoricho station is built, the present Shimbashi terminus will be converted into a goods station only, and a large new station will be built at Shinagawa on reclaimed land for purposes of passengers and goods; further, the big factories and work shops at Shimbashi will be moved to Oimura, in the Omori suburb of Tokyo. The service of trains is to be one every fifteen minutes. We confess that the prospect of this overhead railway becoming a paying concern seems to us very remote.

GAS IN TOKYO.

There is every prospect that an acute phase will soon be entered in the competition between the Tokyo Gas Co. and the Chiyoda Gas Co., which competition was inaugurated recently by the purchase of the Furukawa Coke Factory at Fukagawa. The price hitherto charged by the Tokyo Company has been yen 2.40 per 1,000 cubic feet, but the Chiyoda folks, who announce their determination to commence lighting operations from next October, offer to make contracts at the rate of yen 1.20 for the same quantity. This has made the Tokyo Company's directors "sit up," and they have declared their intention of lowering their rate by 20 per cent., which will bring it to 1.92 yen, a figure still appreciably higher than that of the Chiyoda people. All this must react unfavourably on the Electric-light Companies. These latter will have to reconsider their scale of charges unless they are prepared to be driven out of a large part of the field. Of course people who can afford to be comfortable will never think of substituting gas, malodorous and calorific as it is, for pure and cool electric light. But the lower orders, the restaurant-keepers and the gin-shops, cannot afford to be so fastidious.

THE KINCHOW-AIGUN RAILWAY.

Telegrams received in Shanghai from St. Petersburg and London represent Mr. Willard Straight as working very strenuously to achieve the purpose of the Anglo-American Syndicate with regard to the building of the Kinchow-Aigun Railway. He is said to have had a meeting with M. Iswolsky, but the London Daily Telegraph, writing editorially, declares that his efforts have not been crowned with any success, and that the Russian Government remains unmoved. The London journal adds that the hopes of the Syndicate's representative do not extend beyond the discovery of a basis for negotiation.

We may notice en passant that the old error which describes Japan as having refused to consent to the building of this line is persistently repeated. This is an interesting illustration of the tardiness of truth's travels in pursuit of falsehood. Give the lie only a moment's start and the truth may never be able to overtake it.

THE NAVY.

Japanese newspapers state that among the ships provided for in the 76-millions Implementing Programme, the only ones which have not yet been commenced are a first-class armoured cruiser of 18,000 tons and two destroyers. The ships now actually in hand under this programme are the two battleships Kawachi and Settsu, of which the former will be launched next spring and the latter about October, and the ocean-going destroyer Umikaze (1,500 tons). The above battleships will be very powerful craft. Their dimensions are 480 feet by 84, with a tonnage of 20,800 and boilers capable of developing 20,500 horse-power. This will give a speed of 20 knots an hour. Each of these ships will carry twelve 12-inch guns, ten 6-inch and twelve 4.7-inch. This is much heavier armament than that of the Satsuma or the Aki, namely, four 12-in., twelve 10-in. and twelve 4.7-in.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

On the 22nd ult. a serious disturbance occurred at the High Commercial School in Osaka. A party of second-year students burst into a room where a number of third-year students were engaged in class work, and having removed the teachers, the lads armed themselves with rulers and chairs, and fell upon the third year students. A fierce conflict in which about 100 were engaged was waged for some time, and ended in dangerous injuries to two students and minor hurts to 30 or 40. It appears that this fracas had its origin at the Dojima boat-races on the 9th of May. The boat of the third-year students attempted to run down the boat of the second-year, and the latter lost so much ground in avoiding a collision that victory fell to the third-year students. The enmity caused by that incident has never disappeared, and the second-year students took steps to wreak their vengeance by the attack made on the 22nd.

The Jinju Life Insurance Company stands high among insurance enterprises of the second class in Japan. It has reserves to the extent of 3 million yen and it holds negotiable securities to the extent of over a million. On the 18th ult. it held an extraordinary general meeting for the purpose of altering its statutes, so as to admit of the election of a certain Mr. Shimogo, who is said to have had the support of Baron Tsuji, one of the original projectors of the Company. The meeting resolved itself into a free fight, mainly, so far as we can gather, owing to the machinations of the celebrated Mr. Matsutani, who is chiefly responsible for all the trouble in the Rice-Exchange. Japanese newspapers give somewhat lurid analyses of the events that led to this denouement, but their accounts appear to be more or less sensational.

It appears tolerably certain that there will be a great international exhibition at San Francisco in 1914. The project has not yet been officially announced, but it is spoken of with assurance. It is expected that Japanese residents of San Francisco alone will put up 15,000 yen. Already Mr. Ushijima, the so-called "potato king," has promised 3,000, and several other settlers in California are about to follow suit. Japanese newspapers say that no intimation has as yet reached the United States Embassy, but that the Ambassador has expressed confidence in the liberal co-operation of the Japanese.

We learn with sincere pleasure, which will be shared by all our readers, that Sir Claude MacDonald has been appointed to serve as Ambassador at the Court of Japan for another period of two years from next October, in which month it had been his Excellency's intention to leave this country. Sir Claude has already been nearly 10 years in Japan, having come here in 1900. No British Representative has ever been so universally popular in this country.

It is stated that the "Japan Magazine" has changed hands and that it will henceforth be conducted under the auspices of Baron Shibusawa. The reason of the change is not apparent, but presumably some question of finance is responsible. Certainly the magazine can not be carried on more ably or with greater enterprise under the new régime than it was under the old.

The silk-crop in Italy this year is about the same as that of an average season, in spite of the changes of weather. The latest price for cocoons is from 2.75 to 3.50 per kilos., and raw silk is 45 lira.

The citizens of New York at large and a majority of the newspapers oppose the project of opening an international Exhibition in New York, and the scheme will therefore probably be abandoned.

Many of our readers are doubtless familiar with the name To-A Kogyo Kaisha. It is the title of a Company formed last year by several influential Japanese business-men for the purpose of undertaking contracts for the execution of large works in China. The Company essayed to obtain the contract for the construction of the Kilin-Changchun railway, but it was found that the Chinese had reserved that work for their own people. Then an attempt was made in connection with the salt business of the Leased Territory, but this also was unsuccessful. The consequence is that certain Japanese newspapers are speaking of the Company as a total failure. But it is pointed out, with evident justice, that the main purpose of the organizers of the Company was to have an instrument ready for taking immediate advantage of any opportunity that might arise. Evidently the great principle in life is to be prepared to seize the occasion when it presents itself, and from that point of view the Company has a distinct raison d'être.

The affairs of the Tokyo Rice Exchange continue to be in a disturbed condition. To onlookers it seems as though the Matsutatsu faction—or the Ten-ichibo crowd, as they are frequently called,—have determined to keep up their agitation until the reform party becomes utterly weary. It is a trial of endurance. On the 25th ult., a general meeting was held, and after considerable discussion it was decided to declare a dividend of 12 per cent. for the last half year. The meeting then proceeded to elect a managing director, and Mr. Nezu, leader of the reform party, obtained a majority of votes. The Matsutatsu section could not even carry their candidate into the chair of Vice-Managing Director. After the meeting these insatiable folks made application in due form for an extraordinary general meeting, at which it is said to be their intention to propose an increase of the capital by 3 million yen and also certain changes in the statutes of the Company.

It was stated some time ago in these columns that a coalition for establishing electric works in Tokyo had been formed between the Shibaura Seisakujo, the General Electric Co. of the United States and the Tokyo Electric Co. The capital of the new concern was to be 2 million yen, 1,300,000 yen of which was to be represented by the Shibaura Works, and 500,000 was to be put up by the General Electric Co. Japanese newspapers now state that a hitch has occurred. It is due to the fact that the Tokyo Electric Co. acquired some years ago a right to use patents of the General Electric Co., and is unwilling now to surrender that right except on payment of a sum, to which the American firm is unwilling to agree.

The Toyo S.S. Company has to pay by the end of the year debts amounting to 5,083,000 yen. So far as concerns one million of this amount, which is owing to the First Bank, some law may be obtained, but as for the remaining 5 millions odd Tokyo newspapers say that the money must be found before December. As borrowing is out of the question, the directors are said to have decided that the shareholders must be called upon to pay up a portion of the money still due on the new shares. This step will be taken in November, it is expected, and it will doubtless prove a great hardship for the shareholders, inasmuch as the old shares of the Company (50 yen paid up) are now quoted in the market at 25 yen.

Under the above caption the Saturday Evening Post prints the following keen editorial:

Whenever a warm fight for prohibition comes up, the arguments of the saloon interests resemble a dog in the nugatory act of chasing its own tail. They insist upon the vast importance of the liquor traffic, economically considered—it employs so much labour, rents so many buildings, buys so much corn, hops and glassware. Ten thousand saloons, we read, spend at least a million dollars annually simply for laundering towels, aprons, jackets. If you close the saloons, the laundrymen will be ruined.

We don't think that argument convinces any open-eyed person. Every such person knows too well that the liquor traffic industrially considered is a source of weakness rather than strength. The industrial losses that flow from it far outweigh the gains. If the city lost three laundries and its poorhouse it would, on the net balance, be considerably ahead.

But lest this argument should convince somebody, the saloon interests promptly nullify it by declaring that prohibition does not in the least diminish the consumption of liquor. Consequently it cannot diminish the production, as many hands are employed, as much barley, glassware and cork is bought as before.

The simple fact is, of course, that there is no good argument in favour of the liquor traffic—any more than there is a good argument in favour of tuberculosis. The only question is how best to deal with it.

Marquis Mayeda's new building in the Hongo district of Tokyo, which was erected in accordance with the plans of Dr. Watanabe, has been finished, and it is said that the Emperor will honour the Marquis with a visit about the 2nd of this month. The Mayeda family held the great fief of Kaga in feudal days, and was reckoned among the wealthiest feudatories of Japan. It has the reputation of having preserved quite an exceptional number of heirlooms, which will all be shown on the occasion of the Emperor's visit. We have heard it said on apparently good authority that the family possesses no less than 70 chests-of-drawers filled with costumes for use in the No dance. It is not surprising, therefore, to find that a stage for the performance of that dance forms a feature of the new edifice, and that the sum expended on the stage alone has been 70,000 yen. The dwelling house in foreign style is said to have cost 640,000 yen, and the furniture 200,000. Marquis Mayeda, in addition to Japanese heirlooms, has made a unique collection—unique for Japan—of works of European art.

The sun of prosperity has at length begun to shine upon the Otaru lumber works, which, last year were described as having fallen under a cloud of failure. Large orders for timber are said to have been received from Germany, the United States and Australia, and everything is improving. Mr. Hayakawa, President of the Company, is reported to be seizing the occasion for the purpose of clearing off the debts, reducing the expenses, and carrying out general reforms.

The German Ambassador Baron Mumm has gone to Miyanoshita, from where he expects to start for Europe in a few days. Baron Mumm has been granted a short home leave, from which he expects to be back in Tokyo early in October.

On the 25th ult. the Tokyo Railway Company held its half-yearly general meeting, and decided to pay a dividend of 7 per cent. for the half year ended May the 31st. The meeting passed off uneventfully.

The plan for erecting a monument to Prince Ito at the place of his assassination in Harbin may be said to have matured. The Japanese community in Manchuria are busying themselves earnestly about the matter. The exact spot where the murder took place is within the precincts of the station and cannot therefore be placed at the disposal of the monument committee, nor indeed would it be very suitable for the purpose. But the East-China Railway Authorities are said to have agreed to give a site in the immediate vicinity, and to make it large enough for the construction of a park of which the central feature will be the monument.

It is expected that the Government will introduce in the Diet next session a new factory law. The draft submitted to the House of Representatives was considered defective for several reasons. In the first place it entrusted to officialdom excessive powers which might have been exercised in a manner highly inconvenient for factory owners. In the second place it imposed unpractical restrictions upon the employment of labour. Thus the law provided that no young persons under 13 years of age should be employed in a factory, and that male employees from 14 to 16 years of age as well as all female employees should work only from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Such restrictions would have been fatally inconvenient to sericulture and match making. As to the matter of night-work, factory owners are at one with the Government. But they object to the fixing of hours by local officials.

It is said that a project is on foot to resuscitate the race meetings which flourished so notably a few years ago. The four clubs of Meguro, Itabashi, Kawasaki and Ikegami have joined together, and have decided to issue debentures on the security of the sum promised by the Treasury in 20 annual installments, namely, 1,008,910 yen, and to employ the money upon the necessary preparations. The place of meeting will probably be Meguro.

The Tokyo Municipality are credited with a scheme for deepening the canals and the small streams traversing the city, so as to render them navigable by barges. The dredging will extend to a depth of 3 feet, and the excavated earth will be used to reclaim 100,000 tsubo of fore-shore at Shibaura. Doubtless this will be a useful work, for Tokyo is growing rapidly and the price of land is appreciating all the while.

On the evening of the 28th ult., the members of the Franco-Japanese Society under the Presidency of Prince Kanin entertained at the Maple Club in Tokyo the Admiral-in-Command and ten officers of the French ship now lying in Yokohama. His Excellency the French Ambassador was present, and among the hosts were Baron Tsuji, Professors Ume, Furuichi and Yamada, Count Terajima, Mr. Ozawa, and Mr. Ushikawa, Vice-Minister of Agriculture and Commerce. Baron Tsuji read an address of welcome which was translated into French by Mr. Magaki. The Baron dwelt upon the excellent relations between Japan and France; expressed a confident hope that they would prove permanent, and begged the guests not to measure the good will of their hosts by the incompleteness of their preparations. His Imperial Highness Prince Kanin then proposed the health of the President of the French Republic and His Excellency M. Gerard proposed that of the Emperor of Japan. The French Admiral returned thanks in brief but graceful language.

There is again talk of the municipalization of the Tokyo Railway. At a meeting of the aldermen on the 28th ult. Mr. Nakajima Koko, the constant supporter of this measure, pointed out that the state of the money market seemed eminently suitable for re-approaching the scheme. He obtained much support from his colleagues, but in view of the story of the past nobody places reliance upon municipalization, especially in the absence of Mr. Ozaki.

There is talk of an amalgamation project which would comprise the Tokyo Railway, the Keihin Railway and the Yokohama Electric Trams. The Keihin Railway suffers the most from the present state of affairs. Its line is not linked up with the Yokohama Railway at the Kanagawa end or with the Tokyo Railway at Shinagawa. Undoubtedly this dislocated state of affairs is very unbusiness-like, but whether the railway board would sanction amalgamation is thought to be doubtful. If the lines were joined up, and if the Musashi Electric Railway were built from the Hiroo suburb of Tokyo to Hiranuma, Tokyo and Yokohama would have three routes of inter-communication.

The Jiji Shimpō says that the Manager of the Imperial Hotel in Tokyo has received a letter from Mr. Clark, who organized the party of American tourists that came to Japan in the spring of this year. Mr. Clark says that he is organizing another party consisting of 1,400 persons, all of good social standing, and that he hopes to conduct them to Japan next spring. He adds that the impression produced upon the last party was most excellent.

Prof. Chamberlain returned to Japan on the 29th ult., landing at Yokohama. He was of course interviewed, and his answers to interviewers appear to have escaped the too common distortion. Everywhere during the past two years of his travel in Europe he was questioned about the unbroken succession of the Imperial Family in Japan; about the significance of Bushido, and about the source of the Japanese spirit of loyalty and patriotism. The Professor does not say what answers he gave to these queries. He merely explains that to answer such questions with any degree of fullness requires wide reference to Japanese history. He added that he intends to spend a couple of years travelling in Japan, and that he will devote that time to collecting materials for another work on this country which he will publish on his return to England.

We seem to be on the verge of another crop of rumours about the much talked-of question of municipalizing the Tokyo Railway. In another issue we alluded to a suggestion said to have been made by Mr. Nakajima at a meeting of the Municipal Council, but this morning the Kokumin Shimbun denies that Mr. Nakajima brought the matter definitely on the tapis. He merely commented on the fact that if the Railway were in the city's possession, money could easily be found to meet the various pressing needs without recourse to additional taxation. Other journals, however, maintain that the question of municipalization has again been definitely mooted.

There seems to be a somewhat keen dispute between Mr. Kawashima, chief of the Hokkaido Administration, and the Department of Home Affairs with reference to a reclamation scheme involving an area of 142,000 tsubo near Otaru. This project, if carried out, would greatly affect the value of the land at the port itself, and the people are most unwilling that the work should be undertaken under Government auspices. The Minister of Home Affairs, however, is said to be obdurate, whereas Mr. Kawashima is disposed to compromise by assigning one-half to the people. There is said to be a similar question at Muroran.

"REASON AND SENTIMENT IN JAPAN."

(The Japan Daily Mail, June 25.)

IN a very interesting essay on the above subject, which appeared in these columns on the 23rd instant over the signature "W.D.," the writer alludes to the celebration recently organized in Tokyo to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the assassination of Ii KAMON NO KAMI. He cites the fact that the Commemoration Committee included such men as Count HIJIKATA, formerly Minister of the Imperial Household, General Baron MIYOSHI and Mr. HASEBA, President of the House of Representatives, and he expresses astonishment that assassination finds Japanese to condone it; Japanese of high rank. That is very true. But in the case of Ii, there is another point to be noted, not as vitiating "W.D.'s" conclusions, but as supplementing them. It is that what chiefly strikes a Japanese in connexion with the affair of Ii KAMON NO KAMI is his having signed the Treaties, not merely as foreign treaties, but in defiance of the Sovereign's will. That was the feature against which the assassins directed their weapons. A cognate reason brought frequent worshippers to the grave of NISHINO BUNTARO, the murderer of Viscount MORI. NISHINO's declared motive was to punish an alleged sacrilegious act of Viscount MORI in raising with his walking-stick the curtain before the Shrine at Ise. That was an insult to the Sovereign Ancestors and therefore indirectly to the Sovereign himself. NISHINO, a poor student, actually entered the house of a Minister of State in broad daylight and killed him with the commonest of common weapons, thus vindicating the sanctity of the Imperial Shrine and disgracing its violator. Such was the view taken by the average Japanese onlooker. A man had sacrificed his life in the cause of the Crown and his memory deserved to be honoured. The same blind loyalty to the Throne led to the burning of the celebrated temple Zōjō-ji in 1874. It was the great Buddhist temple of the TOKUGAWA; the temple which IYEYASU had specially delighted to honour; the temple where the mortuary tablets of the TOKUGAWA Shōguns were enshrined. Thus as a stronghold of Buddhism and as the sanctuary of the usurpers of the administrative power it was doubly hateful to the Shintō disciples. In short, loyalty was at the root of all these deeds of violence, and in the cause of loyalty assassination found vindicators.

Another subject alluded to by "W.D." is suicide. Should a soldier prefer suicide to surrender? "W.D." thinks not; Dr. KATO HIROYUKI thinks yes, and if "W.D." speaks with the utmost assurance, so does Dr. KATO. Which is right? To us it seems that if to fight to the bitter end be the duty of a good soldier, then death before surrender is a fine doctrine. For if cool judgment is to be exercised in such a matter; if a man be left free to decide the moment when further resistance has become hopeless and if he be then qualified to surrender, it seems axiomatic that his highest fighting capacity will not be exercised and that "discretion is the better part of valour" may become his constant rule. After all, fighting with deadly weapons is in itself such a barbarous practice that drawing-room ethics can scarcely be applied to it.

THE "DOMINIONS DEPARTMENT" OF THE COLONIAL OFFICE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, June 25.)

IT may come as news to a good many Britons that a "Dominions Department" has been formed within the Colonial Office. At the last Imperial Conference the feeling was expressed, by Mr. DEAKIN and others, that the affairs of the Self-governing Dominions ought not to be mixed up departmentally with those of the Crown Colonies, and the "Dominions Department" is the outcome of that sentiment. This new departure, accepted by a Liberal Government, is a further and welcome indication that Imperial Union is becoming a national, rather than a party, policy.

The first Report of the new Department, for the year ended March 31, was issued at the end of last month in the form of a Blue-book. It consists of a survey of the principal events which have happened in connection with the self-governing Dominions during the year, and it is the wish of the Secretary of State for the Colonies that it should be made year by year. Under the heading of Conferences Sir CHARLES LUCAS, the author of the Report and the head of the Department, deals first with the Imperial Defence Conference, the results of which were duly collated and submitted to Parliament at the end of 1909. It will be remembered that the Canadian representatives at the Conference requested the Admiralty to prepare plans for the establishment of a Canadian Navy, and finally accepted the suggestion that the Dominion Government should provide a Fleet consisting of five cruisers and six destroyers, involving an annual expenditure of £600,000—this Fleet to be placed at the disposal of the Admiralty in the contingency (to quote Sir WILFRID LAURIER) of "war anywhere." Australia also decided to provide a Fleet unit to form part of the Eastern Fleet of the Empire; the annual expenditure is estimated at £750,000, but until the Commonwealth could take over the whole cost it was decided that the Imperial Government should contribute £250,000 annually "towards the maintenance of the complete Fleet unit." Since then a Naval Loan Act has been passed by the Commonwealth Parliament providing for an expenditure of £3,500,000 for the establishment of the Australian Fleet unit, and the order for a battleship-cruiser, which will be the flagship of that unit, has now been placed. In addition to the gift of an armoured cruiser of the Indomitable type, which ship it was arranged should become the flagship of the Fleet unit to be maintained on the China Station, the New Zealand Government undertook to continue to make unconditionally its annual contribution of £100,000 per annum to the Navy. Both the New Zealand and Commonwealth Parliaments have passed a Defence Act, under which provision is made for the introduction of universal military training.

Among other events to which the Report refers is the Barbados Conference, which resulted in the appointment of a Royal Commission to examine the question of mutual preference between the West Indies and Canada. Lord CREWE had already signified the approval of the Government of the principle of preference as applied between Imperial States which already possess tariffs, and it is confidently expected that the Commissioners will report unanimously in favour of reciprocity. This is a notable advance, for the logical conclusion to be drawn from it is that the present Government do not oppose the granting by the home country of reciprocal preference to the Dominions, except in so far as new duties would be specially required for that purpose.

A good deal of space is allotted in the Report to the proceedings of the Imperial Press Conference. Writing of this unique event Sir CHARLES says: "I was in Australia at the time when the Imperial Press Conference was held in London, viz., in June, 1909, and can bear witness to the great interest which was taken in the Dominions in its proceedings. Lord ROSEBURY's speech of welcome gave a keynote to the Conference, and inasmuch as one great want of the Empire—perhaps the greatest—is better and fuller interchange of information, it is doubtful whether any gathering within the Empire, official or unofficial, has ever been more conducive to good understanding and to sound practical results. The Mother Country and the Dominions Beyond the Seas want to know more of each other, and probably the mutual knowledge of the different Dominions is even less than the mutual knowledge of any one of them and the United Kingdom. Misunderstandings tend to be created by insufficient telegraphic intelligence, and when once created they are not easily dispelled through the post. Therefore, it was of much importance that the Conference, among other subjects, dealt with the question of cheapening telegraphic communication."

All of which is good tidings for the Briton over-seas. It shows that the day of Little Englandism is declining: that the Colonies are no longer regarded as burdens to be got rid of at the first opportunity. The new Department has made a good start, and can not fail to serve a most valuable purpose. But the political significance of its initiation is perhaps the most striking feature. It shows that, by sheer force of public sentiment, Liberalism is being driven, in spite of itself, into the path of Imperialism.

BRITISH MILITARY STRENGTH AT HOME AND ABROAD.

(The Japan Daily Mail, June 27.)

IT is not the fashion—even in these days of bloated armaments—to credit the British Empire with a commanding degree of military strength. Probably the man in the street, though he recognizes the great part played by “the thin red line” in the building up of the Empire, will unhesitatingly admit the predominance of the Navy as the common bond and safeguard on which England, her Dominions, her Colonies and her Protectorates have in this present age to rely. The consequence of this accepted predominance of the “first line of defence” is that the military side of British power has somewhat shrunk in the popular imagination as compared, shall we say, with the days of Waterloo and Inkermann. Another circumstance which has affected the British army’s pride of place is the unprecedented growth of Continental armies consequent on the adoption of the principle of universal service. At a time when the Great European Powers count their armies by millions, the land forces of Britain have gradually fallen into a position of relative insignificance. Continental military experts make no secret of the fact that the British army is regarded by them in their strategical calculations as a quantité négligeable. Finally, it must be confessed that, rightly or wrongly, and for reasons into which we cannot enter here, the War Office has come to be regarded by the British public as a veritable hot-bed of inefficiency, and such an impression can hardly have failed to react unfavourably upon the prestige of the British army, whether at home or abroad. In these circumstances, and without referring them to the glorious pages of their history, it can hardly come amiss to remind the British people, as Mr. ARCHIBALD HURD has done in a recent number of the Fortnightly Review, that the military forces of the Empire are by no means inconsiderable even in point of numbers. A propos of the possibilities of invasion, and the demand raised in certain quarters for a national army on the Continental pattern, Mr. HURD briefly reviews the progress of the British Army during the past half-century. In particular, he investigates the volunteer movement in order to ascertain whether voluntary service has proved a failure. At the present day, contends this authority, volunteers are drawn almost exclusively from the working classes, whereas, half a century ago, and especially at the time of the invasion scare of 1859, they were supplied from the wealthier and middle classes. Consequently, it may be claimed that the lower classes have “never rendered the State such efficient service as to-day,” while it is also urged that the military forces of the Empire were never organized on such a commanding scale. It will be remembered that in 1904, and again in 1909, as the result of the fullest enquiries by committees of specially appointed naval and military experts, instituted in the one case by a Unionist and in the other by a Liberal administration, the inhabitants of the British Isles were assured that “invasion on a large scale is an absolutely impracticable operation.” In the light of these findings by the highest tribunals, the only possibility, it is argued, which is to be kept in view in home defence is the evasion of the British fleets by a raiding force of less than 70,000 men. “The Admiralty,” remarks Mr. HURD, “hold that even such a relatively small force cannot be landed, but successive Governments have decided to err on the side of safety.” However, organized as they are, so far as home defence is concerned, for a strictly limited duty—“to deal with a raiding force not exceeding 70,000 men,” the military resources of the Empire seem considerable enough. Their combined strength is shown in the following comparative statement:—

To these may be added the Indian Army of close on 300,000—maintained for the most part by the loyal native Princes—and the local forces of the self-governing Dominions. The Australian scheme alone, we believe, aims at the creation of a force of 200,000 men; and there are, besides, the militia and mounted police of Canada, South Africa and New Zealand, not to mention the native levies of various Crown Colonies and Protectorates in various parts of the world. Including all, we arrive at a figure of approximately 1,300,000, for the aggregate military strength of the Empire. This is no mean total for a “second line of defence,” and, in view of the overwhelming superiority of the Fleet, it is little wonder that the movement for introducing compulsory military service into England makes little headway.

THE Japan Times has an interesting article on the above subject. It notes that the term itself has never found its exact English equivalent, but that it is often misinterpreted to mean commerce between Japanese producers and foreign consumers without the intervention of a middleman. That is doubtless true, and in that sense the word is a misnomer, for in trade the middleman is just as inevitable as the consumer or the producer. There is, in fact, no single equivalent for jiki-torihiki. It is in common use on ‘Change in the sense of “spot transaction,” but, as our Tokyo contemporary says, it is generally employed in Japan in the sense of transactions of over-sea commerce from which the foreign middleman is eliminated on the Japanese side. The Japan Times finds it quite natural and proper that the Japanese should desire to promote such transactions, and to that proposition all level-headed foreigners will be disposed to assent. The Japan Times, however, goes on to say that the desire of the Japanese merchant to dispense with open-port intermediaries has been emotionally augmented by pique. The foreigners in the Settlements have represented the Japanese as morally unfit to become the direct vis-à-vis of men living at a great distance, and eagerness to refute that accusation practically has contributed to inspire Japanese effort. We can not see any room for denial. But it is important to consider how far any improper use of such an argument has been made by the foreign settlers. To what extent; if at all, have they exaggerated the defects of Japanese commercial morality in order to enhance their own usefulness and to deter Europeans or Americans from agreeing to dispense with their services? A great many years ago the two leading foreign firms in the East—an English firm and an American firm—were represented respectively by Mr. FRANK JOHNSON and Mr. THOMAS WALSH. That was in the days of Sir HARRY PARKES, and more than once Sir HARRY was heard to declare that if he needed advice on any subject connected with commerce or finance, he should choose these two men as councillors before all others. One evening the writer happened to be present when Mr. WALSH and Mr. JOHNSON compared notes of their firms’ experiences in Japan. Both agreed that in the early era of Yokohama’s existence no such thing as a written contract had ever been necessary in dealing with the Japanese: their word was as good as their bond. But, after a time, that admirable state of affairs had come to an end, and had been replaced by a remarkable absence of good faith. What was the explanation of the unwelcome change? There was no difficulty in replying. The samurai had been excluded from

Yokohama. Owing to the sanguinary acts of certain ronin, it had been deemed necessary to close the Settlement to all two-sworded men. There was no immediately apparent reason why expulsion of the sword-bearer should have led to the exodus of high-class merchants. But it did. Yokohama become taboo, and all reputable tradesmen stood aloof from the place. Any Japanese conversant with the facts will bear out this retrospect. Thus the foreign merchant found himself in contact with tradesmen who had no reputation to lose and who deemed it rather a fine coup to cheat the over-sea trader. Residents who can look back to the ni-azukari affair of 1881 know that for a moment the situation promised to infuse into the Settlement's commercial arteries some of the best blood Japan had to give. But what ultimately resulted was diametrically different. The dispute hinged upon the question whether Japanese men of business could be trusted, and the answer on the foreign side was "No; not yet." This may be called the second segregation of Yokohama, and it may also be called the immediate prelude to "direct trade"; for one of the great Japanese firms which then knocked fruitlessly at Yokohama's door, thereafter became, and ever since has remained, the leader of the "direct trade" movement. But it is not to be inferred that the Yokohama Japanese continued to consist entirely of men outside the pale. The celebrated "KINGDON Memorial" of 1885 declared clearly that a better class of Japanese had begun to frequent the local mart, and that though some "remnants of an evil past" were still en evidence, the foreigners were content on the whole. Have those "remnants of an evil past" disappeared entirely, now 26 years after the compilation of the KINGDON Memorial? They have not. Nor do we believe that they ever will disappear completely, so long as the Settlement remains practically segregated. That is a question apart, however. The point we desire to make is that Japan has not shown her best side to the foreign merchant. On the contrary, she has shown him her worst, and the conclusions he has drawn, as well as the complaints he has made, have been, for the most part, warranted. No one will pretend that everything has been above reproach on the foreign side. There are black sheep in every fold. But as we have often said, the standard of morality in the foreign community of Yokohama and Kobe is quite above the normal level. The same number of men, blocked indiscriminately out of the population of any Western country, would by no means reach such a standard. On the other hand, the Japanese population of the two ports, as originally constituted, were far from attaining the average level of their fellow-countrymen, and the impression produced by long contact with them has been unfavourable. It can not fairly be alleged therefore that the foreign merchant's complaints have been without warrant, or that they were originally dictated by an unfriendly purpose.

BRITAIN IN EAST AFRICA.

(The Japan Daily Mail, June 28.)

AFRICA of late has occupied a larger share of public attention than has fallen to its lot for some years past. At one end of the Continent which used to be signalled out from the rest by the epithet "Dark," the federation of the four principal States into a new South African Dominion under the British flag makes a land-mark in its history. At the other, an unrest which bears a more than superficial resemblance to the externally fostered agitation of the United Irish League and its natural offspring, the Swadeshi movement of the Bengali baboos, has brought the Lower Valley of the Nile into discreditable prominence. How then has it fared with that portion of the British Empire which lies midway along the "Cape to Cairo" line? In this part of the continent we have the extensive territories collectively known as British East Africa, embracing an area of 320,000 square miles, with a population of 7½ millions, and we have that somewhat nondescript and little-known region designated Somaliland. In one of these there has been progress, peaceful and effective; in the other there has been withdrawal, abandonment. The one has already its iron road, 800 miles in length, leading from a malarial coast to a temperate upland region described as an ideal "white man's land," and destined to form, at no very distant date, a flourishing colony athwart one of the great trade-routes of the world. The other has been left to the desert and its own devices. And the question is being asked, in the various parts of the Empire—Is the evacuation of Somaliland a justifiable proceeding or not? No less an authority than Lord CURZON has condemned this measure as unwise, and as certain to involve re-occupation at greater cost in the near future. It is urged that England will be compelled to come to the support of the friendly tribes, as against the attacks of the Mullah, that the evacuation of the country will adversely affect British prestige throughout the Mahommedan world, and lead, possibly, to complications with Abyssinia. These objections appear, however, to be founded more upon sentiment than upon fact. Those who have actually resided in Somaliland are unanimous in regarding the interior as worthless—"a waterless district from which no trade can ever be developed." In this respect it will bear no comparison with the Soudan. That region, apart from its immensely important strategic position, is inextricably bound up with the welfare of Egypt, and, even apart from the latter, is not without resources of its own. As to the friendly tribes, an officer who has taken part in the several Somaliland campaigns declares that these natives are not, and need not, be "harassed." They are well armed, and stronger than any combination which the "Mullah," even allowing him the power with which he is popularly credited, could bring against them. There is even the probability that these "friendly" tribes will, in their keen desire to get Government treasure again lavished on their country and themselves, pretend to be "harassed," and spread most highly plausible and credible reports to show that this is the case. With this view of the situation the Indian troops who participated in the various operations are said to concur in the heartiest manner. Indeed, they find it difficult to understand the British Government's profligate waste of life and treasure on a "worthless dust-heap." And with this unflattering estimate there is reason to believe that the Abyssinians also fully agree. Further, the Mullah has been officially disavowed from Mecca, so that whatever influence he may have possessed is said to be distinctly on the wane, and indeed, more recently, reports have reached the coast of his death. Altogether there appears to be little cause for reproach on account of the Government's decision, or for anxiety as regards the future. So long as England holds the coastline and the port of Zeila, her position and prestige are secure; while, should an expedition ever for any reason be deemed necessary, that port will meet all the requirements of a base. In view, therefore, of all the circumstances, the withdrawal from the interior of Somaliland must be held to be rather a triumph of common sense than a shirking of responsibility, and there is no reason to believe, despite statements to the contrary, that the position of Britain in Eastern Africa has been weakened in any degree, either morally, commercially or strategically.

THE TURCO-GREEK CRISIS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, June 29.)

THE latest intelligence regarding that international bone of contention, the island of Crete, is far from reassuring. It is clear that popular feeling in both the countries most nearly concerned has reached a dangerous pitch of excitement. The boycott against Greek goods, inaugurated some weeks ago in Turkey, has become, in its rigour and universality, a veritable jihad, and has called forth an official protest from Athens. On the other hand, the continued military preparations on the Greek frontier have been made a subject of diplomatic representation by the Grand Vizier, and the Brigade of Redifs has been called out as a precautionary measure. On their side, the protecting Powers have shown a timely firmness by despatching an additional warship each to Suda Bay. While, however, the official arbiters of the situation may display a laudable determination to prevent any breach of the peace, the danger is lest the populations on either side of the Turco-Greek frontier should get out of hand, and thus precipitate a conflict. The whole history of Cretan insurrection during the past seventy years does not inspire hopes of a peaceful settlement, nor can it be forgotten that it is little more than a decade since Turkish troops marched on Larissa. It is now twelve years since Crete was declared autonomous and taken under the protection of the four Powers, Great Britain, France, Russia, and Italy. The conditions were that it was to remain under the nominal suzerainty of the Sultan, whose jurisdiction, nevertheless, was not to run in the island, and whose troops and officials had left it, on the clear understanding that they were not to return. On the other hand, the four Powers promised the Turkish Government that Crete should not be annexed to the Kingdom of Greece. Since then, however, there have been difficulties and, in view of the more or less violently expressed aspirations of the Cretans, it was agreed that the High Commissioner of the island should be proposed by the KING of GREECE, and that the direction of the local Gendarmerie and Militia should be in the hands of Greek officers. In 1908, after the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary, the Cretan Chamber took the aggressive step of declaring the island united with Greece, and appointed a provisional Government to administer in the name of the KING of the HELLENES. The Powers remonstrated, and requested the KING of the HELLENES to remove from his Army such officers as were serving in Crete. Subsequently in accordance with an earlier undertaking, the Powers withdrew their troops from the island, though when the Cretans hoisted the Greek flag on the fort at Canea, the sailors of the Powers cut it down. More recently the members of the Chamber have caused a recrudescence of the popular unrest by taking an oath of allegiance to the KING of the HELLENES, and have excluded their Mohammedan colleagues who declined to take that oath. To this provocative action the protecting Powers have responded by intimating to the Cretans that the union of the island with Greece cannot be permitted, and they have informed Turkey that its sovereignty over the island will be fully respected. In Greece, however, the incessant agitation of the Cretans during the past two years has led to something like a revolution. Successive administrations have accepted the advice of the Powers, but have found it impracticable after that to retain their popularity. Several causes contribute to the present somewhat over-strained condition of the country. The present generation of Greeks have grown up under the impression that they might hope for the union of Crete with their Kingdom. The bitterness and disgrace of the last war have not yet died out, and, taken in conjunction with this, the dominating influence of the Military League is perhaps the most disquieting factor of the situation. The KING has had a trying part to play. With great difficulty he has tided over the troubles of the past two years, and Greece officially continues to be amenable to the wishes of the Powers in regard to Crete. On the other hand, unless the Turkish Government continues to negotiate with the four Powers and refrains from menace to Greece, of which the effect can only be to arouse the sympathy of Western Europe for the Greeks, the situation can not fail to become increasingly serious.

As regards the policy of the British Government, this was explained by Sir EDWARD GREY in the spring of last year, when he said in the House of Commons that the question of the status of Crete must be considered by the four Powers and by the Turkish Government. Sir EDWARD GREY then thought that, as the Powers had found solutions for the questions of Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Bulgaria, it ought not to be impossible for the four Powers and Turkey to find a solution of the Cretan question also. From this line of joint consultation and action there has been no deviation, and it is satisfactory to learn that the attempts recently been made to suggest encouragement by England of Cretan aspirations on the score of the relationship between the British and Grecian monarchies have utterly failed in their sinister aim. The Cretan question strikingly illustrates the danger of sentiment in international affairs and it is therefore the more essential that the situation should be handled in a firm and straight-forward manner.

THE TREATY OF 1894.

(The Japan Daily Mail, June 30.)

WE observe that a controversy of some interest is going on between the Japan Times and the Japan Chronicle. The latter has quoted a passage from "Things Japanese" in which Professor CHAMBERLAIN represent the Japanese as having obtained by the Revised Treaty of 1894 a great deal more than they gave in return, the implication being that the Treaty was one-sided, and that to speak of it is a "treaty of equality" is altogether a misnomer. The Japan Times is at some pains to defend Japan against any implication of unfairness or greed in the matter. But of what use is the controversy? Of course Professor CHAMBERLAIN is historically correct. Japan was willing at one time to purchase her judicial and tariff autonomy at a higher price than she ultimately paid. That, however, was perfectly natural, seeing that, in the interval, she had qualified much more fully to be trusted with the duty of protecting foreign life and property. But Professor CHAMBERLAIN, in his scanty list of Japan's payments, forgets to mention that she made one very substantial concession: she agreed to continue the conventional tariff for a period of 12 years. She had already been bound by that tariff for 40 years, and she consented to be bound by it for 12 years longer. The truth is, as we think, that to discuss any question of "equality" in the case of the 1894 treaty is to commit an error. The problem was, not what the Western Powers could obtain from Japan, but what they would consent to give back to her of her own proper belongings. At the outset of their renewed relations with her, they had imposed certain irksome terms derogatory to her sovereign rights. These terms they consented to forego, partly in 1899 and wholly in 1911. They might have insisted upon safeguards which would have greatly marred the grace of their act; but they appreciated that the time for such caution had gone by, and that to have postponed revision would have been a political mistake. That appears to us to be the whole story in a nutshell. As for the Japan Chronicle's assertion that "the Kokumin, the Japan Times, and the other organs which are assumed to represent the views of the Japanese Government persist in representing Japan as being unjustly and unfairly treated by the terms of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty of 1894 and the treaties subsequently negotiated of which it formed the model," we can find no warrant for such an interpretation of those journals' writings. What they have contended is that the conventional tariffs were forced upon Japan when her power of self-assertion was comparatively insignificant, and that to cite these tariffs as standards for her new schedule of rates is inconsiderate and unjust. After all, has there not been injected into this controversy a great deal of misplaced sentiment?

IS IT PEACE?

(The Japan Daily Mail, June 30.)

THE telegraph of late has been singularly silent—absit omen—as to the course of the Constitutional Conference. The prayer has gone up from Moderate men of all shades of political opinion that "consideration, like an angel," might come and "whip the offending Adam," in the shape of tyrannous minorities of extremists, out of the Liberal party. But "offending Adams" have a way of dying hard—or, at least, of delaying their wished-for exit from the bodies of their awakening victims; and it is precisely this feature of the situation which complicates the issue. We make bold to say that, were it not for the minor and less tractable sections of the Coalition, no Conference would have been necessary. As it is, the Labour and Nationalist sections, not to mention the red-Republican wing of the Radical party, are doing their best to make the heaven-sent truce a truce—and nothing more. The horizon of conciliation is already clouded over with extremist protests. The general feeling of the Labour members, says the Parliamentary correspondent of The Times, is that, if as the result of a conference a compromise were arrived at, it would lead to the collapse of the Liberal Party, and that even if an unsuccessful conference were held, the fact that compromise was being considered would damp the spirits of the Government's supporters in the country. "The Parliament Bill," they say, "based upon the Veto resolutions, expresses the irreducible minimum of what we can accept." To a postponement of the struggle they will consent, but to concessions they will not. On the other hand, the Nationalists are equally hostile to peace. It is recognized that Mr. REDMOND has already sufficiently risked his hold on Ireland by permitting the passage of a hated Budget. But, as Mr. W. O'BRIEN makes haste to point out, the article for which he has paid—to wit, Home Rule—is not forthcoming. "Either Mr. REDMOND and his friends," says their arch enemy, "must renew their mad ultimatum to the KING to begin his reign by abolishing the Lords—in which event they would drive the Government and themselves into annihilation at a general election—or they would have to swallow the ultimatum, and let the Veto question subside until the autumn or next year. In the latter event there would be a compromise, making the Second Chamber a more formidable obstacle to Home Rule than the Lords." It is not likely therefore that the Irish leader, with growing Irish discontent behind him, will look with complacency on a Home Rule prospect which grows smaller by degrees and beautifully less. Apart from the extremists, however, it must be admitted that, on the eve of the Conference, opinion as to its outcome was by no means optimistic. The official Liberal position in the matter was set forth in a statement issued shortly before the opening of Parliament, the preamble of which ran as follows:—

The position of the Government in regard to the suggestions for a conference between the leaders of the parties and an eventual compromise is understood to be as follows: The Cabinet has put forward a scheme which it regards as a moderate one, and which, being in its general lines similar to that proposed by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, has been now for several years before the public. The Government cannot on its own initiative indicate any intention of departing from this plan in favour of another, the very root principles of which could not, in the nature of things, be now defined. At the same time, there is no doubt many Ministers would welcome a suggestion for a conference authoritatively put forward on behalf of the Unionist leaders; indeed, such a proposal, advanced in good faith, the Government could not refuse without incurring considerable odium in the country. In the absence of such authoritative proposal, however, the Cabinet has no option but to proceed at the earliest moment practicable with the plan it has laid before the House of Commons both in the form of resolutions and of a carefully-drafted Bill. It may be doubted whether between the Government scheme for the limitation of the Lords' Veto and the Unionist proposals for reform of the House of Lords as indicated by approval of Lord Rosebery's resolutions, any middle way exists, but that a conference could be secured, if desired by Unionist leaders, is certain.

The general belief at the opening of the session was that, in the event of no conference being held or of the discussion between the party leaders proving abortive, the Government's anti-Veto resolutions would probably be taken early in the autumn. Opinion in political circles now points to September as the date of the General Election, and this despite the fact that members of all parties in the House of Commons are extremely averse to another election this year. The suggestion has indeed been advanced that time might be gained by sending to the House of Lords a Bill providing for the holding of all elections on one day, or even by resuscitating the Plural Voting Bill and the London Elections Bill, the appeal to the electors being deferred till January or February. There is, however, in official quarters an objection to prolonging the campaign as was done last year, and it may be taken that the earlier date is the one provisionally adopted in case a Dissolution is necessitated. The present Ministerial intention is that a General Election shall follow, as swiftly and as dramatically as possible, any action on the House of Lords which from the Government's point of view renders it inevitable—assuming, of course, that the Conference proves a failure.

The most unfortunate feature of the whole situation is the utter dependence of Ministers upon the extremist sections. The only alternative to bowing before these rabid taskmasters is that of calling in the aid of a Unionist Opposition to keep a Liberal Government in power. It is small wonder that Ministers should hesitate when called upon to choose between two humiliations. We do not believe that Home Rule and the destruction of the Lords are causes so dear to the hearts of Ministers than they cannot bring themselves to abate a jot of their proposals. We believe that the crux of the problem is their own helplessness. Consequently, the general expectation—we speak of the eve of the Conference—was, as Mr. J. L. GARVIN puts it, that "Ministers seem likely to meet the situation by throwing up their hands." They have no majority of their own. They are dependent for a majority upon the factions whom they cannot control. The aim of those factions is not to restore the stability of the Constitution, but to wreck it—to eliminate every principle of firmness and balance it contains, and to make it more impotent than any other political system in the whole world to stay the destructive impulses of future agitation. That is the predicament—a policy without sense or sincerity, feebly endeavouring to combine Double-

Chamber theory with Single-Chamber practice: a Government without dependence, scourged by the factions without responsibility who represent not a seventh part of the entire people of the United Kingdom." Of what use, it may well be asked, will it be for the Conference to arrive at a settlement as between the Liberal and Unionist parties, if a combined Labour-Nationalist vote is to turn the Government out of office at the first opportunity? It is to be hoped that a settlement in theory—if such be arrived at—will include a plan for common action in view of such a contingency. Only thus can Moderation triumph, and, with it, Peace.

THE FOREIGN MERCHANT.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 1)

PERIODICALLY the foreign merchant in Japan becomes a topic of discussion in the columns of the vernacular press. The latest exponent of this question is the Chuo Shimbun, a journal of much importance. Inspiration is supplied by the fact that the settlements are experiencing an evil time. Trade is bad, and our contemporary writes as though the chief sufferers were the foreign merchants, from which conclusion it is but a short step to the theory that foreigners may be finding life in Japan not worth the candle. The Chuo's tone is not in the least inimical. It admits frankly that the country's oversea commerce was built up by foreigners, and it disclaims the faintest desire to see them eliminated. Nevertheless it evidently thinks that elimination is their fate sooner or later, and that the best chance for them lies in abandoning the settlements and seeking investments in the interior. Well, after all, there is no room for sentiment in business, and, for the rest, the life-time of one generation generally suffices to obliterate the memory of any benefit, however signal. Even we, who can look back to Yokohama's early days, find difficulty in conceiving what Japan would have been now, had not foreigners carried hither their business experience and their capital. We have little doubt that the Japanese would have "worried through" somehow. They have a wonderful knack of finding their way to the goal sooner or later. But it must have been much later, immeasurably later. Instead of collecting from 40 to 50 million yen of customs dues, the Treasury would have been getting probably a mere tithe of that sum; and instead of a commerce of eight or nine hundred millions, the figure would have been a paltry hundred or two. That is beyond dispute and the Japanese themselves admit it frankly. On the other hand, no foreigner denies that the Japanese are acting naturally and reasonably when they try to get the trade into their own hands. Neither is it denied that some success has attended their efforts, always with the reservation that if the Japanese share has increased of late years, so also has the bulk of the foreign part. There is room for both. An interesting question is, however, — what value attaches to the Chuo's contention that the segregation of the foreign residents militates against their permanent tenure of a leading place in the trade? We are of the opinion that considerable importance belongs to that phase of the matter, and we have often said so. Whatever the legal rights of the house-tax question may have been, it was, we believe, short-sighted statesmanship to press a claim which differentiated the foreign residents from the people of the land, and thus perpetuated the barriers which the revised treaties were intended to remove. Experience and observation must by this time have taught to all close observers the lesson that the foreigner's best hope of doing a satisfactory business in Japan is to become incorporated as thoroughly as possible with the nation, and cease to form part of a separate community.

SOCIALISM IN JAPAN.

Socialism in Japan seems to have somewhat more ramifications than rumour has hitherto attributed to it, but so far as we can see, its disciples and supporters are wholly unimportant persons, not at all likely to attempt anything heroic or to sacrifice their lives to an ideal. The men and women recently arrested belonged to Kishu prefecture and were under the leadership of a fanatic called Kotoku. News is now published of two other groups of socialists, one in Shinshu prefecture, the other in Kyushu. These two groups appear to have for leader one, Nishikawa. Fourteen arrests have been made at a place called Suwa in Nagano and four arrests have been made in Tokyo, the latter being connected with the plot in Kyushu. Some interest attaches to these Tokyo arrests. We read that the socialists found means to possess themselves of a quantity of Russian rifles and ammunition after the fall of Port Arthur. They managed to ingratiate themselves with a contractor who had engaged to carry the arms and ammunition to Moji, and it seems that for the last 3 years they have been vainly endeavouring to smuggle these spoils to some centre where they would be accessible on occasion. Their efforts finally led to detection, and it is expected that the four arrests made in Tokyo will be followed by others in the southern provinces.

The Niroku writes in a somewhat sensational strain about these arrests. It says that socialism in Japan has hitherto been regarded with indifference, if not with contempt, but that hereafter the Authorities will have to act with a high hand.

The police have made an arrest which causes much surprise and conjecture. The victim is Mr. Okumiya Kenshi, formerly a well-known Liberal who strongly supported Count Itagaki's campaign in Tosa 36 years ago, but who has been little heard of in recent times. Of course nothing is definitely known as to the crime charged against him, but it is confidently believed that the police regard him as an accomplice of Kotoku, who was recently apprehended for being in possession of explosives intended to serve nefarious purposes. A representative of the Chuo Shimbun called upon Mr. Koyama, the would-be assassin of Li Hung-chang on the occasion of the latter's embassy to Japan in the spring of 1895. Koyama was sentenced to be imprisoned for life, but obtained his release on the occasion of the amnesty granted when the Crown Prince was married. He told the Chuo's representative that he believed Okumiya's arrest to be entirely due to a misunderstanding on the part of the police. Okumiya, who is his intimate friend, has never entertained socialistic ideas, or been implicated in socialist plots, and his only fault, according to Koyama, is that he happens to be a native of Tosa, to which province Kotoku belongs.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Friday, June 24.

The reaction continued yesterday but on a more emphatic scale.

Saturday, June 25.

Prices entered the downward grade again on Saturday. No one cause appears to be eminently responsible. Several factors, as detailed some time ago in these columns, inspire an uneasy feeling, and it seems to be believed that there will be no substantial improvement for the present.

Monday, June 27.

Yesterday a great debacle took place in spot transactions. The shares of the Exchange itself dropped 7 points. This was of course followed by depression, though on a minor scale, in the domain of time bargains, and all prices declined. A slight stiffening took place in the afternoon session, but it was not very marked.

Tuesday, June 28.

The debacle continued yesterday, settling day. The shares of the Exchange, which generally constitute a barometer, tumbled down $6\frac{1}{2}$ points, and were quoted at less than 209, a striking contrast to 240, the figure recently reached. This movement did not manifest itself so sharply in other directions, however.

Thursday, June 30.

The market assumed a strong and lively tone yesterday. Rumours of a Russo-Japanese treaty and a lowering of the Bank of Japan's discount rate were vigorously circulated and produced a buoyant effect. We append the quotations for August delivery:—

The figures for settling-day on the Tokyo Stock Exchange showed conclusively what a dull month June had been. The number of shares settled was 97,170, being a diminution of 2,910 compared with May; the total price was 5,838,820 yen, a reduction of 911,110 yen, and the average price was 68.089, being a falling-off of no less than 7.356 per share.

IMPERIAL ORDINANCE.

TO BE PROMULGATED JULY 1, 1910.

Article 1.—Japanese and foreign ships and warships may enter West Harbour of Port Arthur, provided they observe the Port Arthur Harbour Regulations.

Article 2.—The Governor-General of Kwantung may make necessary provisions and dispositions, provided they do not conflict with the provisions of the Law respecting the Defence-works zone of Kwantung Province and the Port Arthur Harbour Regulations, within the limits of Port Arthur; with regard to matters, however, specially designated by the Minister President, he must previously consult with the Commander-in-Chief of the Port Arthur Naval Station.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLE.

The present ordinance shall come into force on the day of its promulgation.

NAVY DEPARTMENT ORDINANCE.

TO BE PROMULGATED JULY 1, 1910.

PORT ARTHUR HARBOUR REGULATIONS.

Article I.—The harbour limits of Port Arthur are divided into three divisions: the portion within the single-dotted line in the annexed plan is called the First Division, that outside the First Division but within the double-dotted line the Second Division, and the whole portion outside the First and Second Divisions the Third Division; and West Harbour is included in the Third Division.

Article II.—West Harbour may be entered by Japanese and foreign ships and warships.

In the Third Division excluding West Harbour, ships and warships may freely anchor so far they do not obstruct the fairway; in the case, however, of a ship or warship laden with explosives or readily combustible objects, the Chief of the Naval Port Office may specially assign its berth.

Article III.—The First and Second Divisions cannot be entered without the permission of the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station by any ships or warships other than those belonging to the Imperial Navy; this rule, however, does not apply to those ships and warships which pass through the Second Division en route from one part of the Third Division to another part of the same Division.

Even among the ships and warships belonging to the Imperial Navy, those whose displacement is not less than fifteen tons shall, when they propose to enter the First Division, obtain therefore the permission of the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station.

Article IV.—Ships and warships, which propose to enter Port Arthur, shall, from the time they are at the distance of about three nautical miles from the harbour limits until they reach their anchorage or mooring-place, each exhibit its name according to the International Code of Signals; this rule, however, does not apply to cases in which the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station does not consider such exhibition necessary and has given previous notice to that effect.

Article V.—Ships and warships which are lying or under weigh within the harbour limits of Port Arthur or on the water not more than about three nautical miles distant therefrom, shall, except in cases otherwise specially provided for, hoist a flag showing their nationality.

Article VI.—Ships and warships which are lying or under weigh within the harbour-limits of Port Arthur or on the water not more than about three nautical miles distant therefrom, shall from sunset till sunrise hoist the various lights provided for in the laws and ordinances relating to the prevention of collisions at sea.

Article VII.—Ships and warships and warships entering from any places at home or abroad, which, in cases falling under any of the items in Art. IV., Clause I., of the Seaport Quarantine Law, have not completed their quarantine or disinfection, shall not be allowed, unless permission is obtained from the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station, to enter the waters of the First and Second Divisions and West Harbour; and ships and warships on board which cases of infectious diseases have occurred while in the water of the First or Second Division or West Harbour, shall hoist the quarantine signal and await the orders of the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station.

In the cases mentioned in the preceding clause, matters relating to the quarantine of ships and warships not belonging to the Imperial Navy shall be determined by the Governor-General of Kwantung.

Article VIII.—Ships and warships of at least five hundred tons, not belonging to the Imperial Navy, which enter or leave the water of West Harbour, must take a pilot when entering, before they enter the Second Division until they reach their berths, and when leaving, from the time they quit their berths until they are quite clear of the Second Division; this rule, however, does not apply to cases in which the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station does not consider such course necessary and has given previous notice to that effect.

The pilot mentioned in the preceding clause must be a member of the First Naval Reserve, who has obtained the official approval of the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station.

Provisions relating to pilots shall be determined by the Governor-General of Kwantung.

Article IX.—The movements of ships and warships in the waters of the First and Second Divisions, and West Harbour shall, except in the case of boats with a displacement of more than fifteen tons, take place according to the direction of the Chief of the Naval Port Office; this rule, however, does not apply to cases in which it is not possible to await such direction on account of acts of nature or other unforeseen accidents.

Matters relating to the movements of ships and warships in the water of West Harbour mentioned in the preceding clause shall, in the case of such ships and warships as do not belong to the Imperial Navy, be determined by the Governor-General of Kwantung.

Article X.—The Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station may, if necessary, order the ships and warships in harbour to change their berths or take other measures.

Article XI.—The Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station may, if he deems dangerous any articles in the lading of ships and warships which have entered or are about to enter the First Division, order such articles to be unloaded.

Article XII.—All ships and warships, except those which have been specially permitted by the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station, are forbidden to enter within one hundred and thirty ken of the powder-magazines; the same rule applies also to steam-launches having their boilers alight and all other boats having fires on board.

Article XIII.—It is forbidden within the limits of Port Arthur to discharge fire-arms and explosives except salutes, signal guns and those for which the permission of the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station has been obtained; within seventy five ken of public and private houses and buildings no discharge or firing whatever of even salutes or signal guns is allowed unless the permission of the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station has been obtained.

The prohibition mentioned in the preceding clause does not apply to such matters as target practice carried out by the military authorities outside the grounds for the use of the Imperial Navy and the waters within the harbour-limits.

Article XIV.—In the waters of the First and Second Divisions fishing and seaweed-gathering shall not be carried on without the special permission of the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station.

Article XV.—It is forbidden, unless the permission of the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station has been obtained, to throw any object whatever into the waters of the First and Second Divisions, the shores thereof, and the streams flowing thereinto.

The Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station may, if he deems it necessary, prohibit the throwing of objects into the Third Division excluding West Harbour and the shore thereof and assign for the time a place for the throwing away of such objects.

Ships and warships which are themselves unable to dispose of the things which they should throw away, must, if they are ships and warships of the Imperial Navy, apply for the disposal thereof to the Naval Post Office and if they do not belong to the Imperial Navy, follow the provisions therefor to be made by the Governor-General of Kwantung.

Article XVI.—With regard to obnoxious wreckages, rubbish, and other objects within the harbour-limits of Port Arthur, the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station may, irrespectively of the cause thereof, require the persons responsible therefor to remove them within a stipulated period; and in the event of such responsible persons failing to remove them or of there being no prospect of their being completely removed within the stipulated period, the Commander-in-Chief may himself or cause a third person to remove or destroy them and collect the expenses so incurred from the responsible persons.

If it is not known who are the persons responsible, the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station may remove or destroy them.

As to the disposal of obnoxious wreckages, rubbish, and other objects in West Harbour, regulations relating thereto shall be determined by the Governor-General of Kwantung.

Article XVII.—Fires shall not be wantonly lighted in the forests and waste land within the limits of Port Arthur.

Article XVIII.—With regard to the new constructions and alterations within the limits of Port Arthur which are enumerated under the following headings, the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station is to be consulted by the Governor-General of Kwantung:—

1. Construction of piers and quays;
2. Alteration of river-beds, filling in and dredging of rivers and seas, digging of the shore, and erection of stone walls on the shore;
3. Opening of roads, canals, ditches, and tunnels, and construction of bridges and railways;
4. Digging and building up of earth-foundations;
5. Carrying on of the business of marine transportation having a terminal point within the harbour-limits of Port Arthur;
7. Placing of buoys, beacons, and other guide-marks for navigation;
8. Erection of buildings, warehouses, and all other structures on the shore of the First and Second Divisions and West Harbour at a distance of not more than seven hundred and fifty ken of the waters within the harbour-limits or the ground for the use of the Imperial Navy.

Article XIX.—It is forbidden, except with the permission of the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station, to make surveys, take photographs, make sketches, write down descriptions, or issue books and maps, such as guides to topography, of the features of the land and water within the harbour-limits of Port Arthur; this rule, however, does not apply to the taking of soundings necessary for movements of ships and warships when they are under weigh.

Article XX.—The prohibition mentioned in the preceding article does not apply to those done by the military authorities outside the ground for the use of the Imperial Navy and waters within the harbour limits.

Article XXI.—The Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station may, if he considers any person to be studying plans of the fortifications and such matters as topographical features within the limits of Port Arthur, order such persons to quit the limits of Port Arthur.

Article XXII.—The Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station may, if he deems it necessary for the purpose of control, put a restriction, after consultation with the Governor-General of Kwantung, upon the use by the general public of the public road contiguous to the ground for the use of the Imperial Navy.

The Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station

may permit the general public to use such portions only of the ground for the use of the Imperial Navy as he may deem unobjectionable for the purpose of control.

Article XXI.L.—It is forbidden to remove or destroy any stones, posts, or notice-boards used to mark the limits and divisions of Port Arthur, or any buoy within the harbour limits thereof.

Article XXIV.—Rules and regulations relating to control within the limits of Port Arthur shall, after consultation with the Governor-General of Kwantung, be determined by the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLES.

The present regulations shall be brought into force on the day of its promulgation.

The Commander-in-Chief of the Port Arthur Naval Station may, when so requested by the Governor-General of Kwantung, cause, for the present, members of the staff of the Naval Port Office of Port Arthur to act as pilots in the harbour limits thereof.

THE PROPOSED AQUEDUCT BETWEEN LAKE CHUZENJI AND THE KEGON FALL.

LOCAL OPINION ON THE SUBJECT.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

The proprietors of the Ashio Mine, Nikko, have brought forward a project to construct an aqueduct for utilitarian purposes from Lake Chuzenji to the Kego Fall, and the application for its sanction has been sent in to the government authorities. The townsfolk of Nikko are reported to have strongly opposed the project and to have insisted that the undertaking should not be sanctioned, on the ground that the said works would detract from the natural charm of the district. But most of those who are opposed to the undertaking cannot be fully acquainted either with the actual conditions of the place or with the particulars of the project, and they raise objections which are based only upon their own imagination, so that their arguments miss the main point. No solid reasons have as yet been advanced which would lead ordinary people to fall in with these objections. As the writer does not claim any expert knowledge of engineering work, no attempt will be made to criticise the Ashio scheme, but it may be of interest to investigate the matter from the economic point of view.

It is well known that a large electric power-house has recently been established at the Ashio mine for supplying hydro-electric power for the various kinds of machinery in the copper-refining works, and the water required for the generation of the electricity is already supplied from Lake Chuzenji. The outflow of the Lake, after being precipitated into the Kego gorge, forms the rapid Otani River and then enters the compound of the Ashio mine. In the summer season there is plenty of water, so that no difficulty is felt in supplying the motive power, but in winter the water in the lake usually decreases in volume, so that in the stream running from the Lake to the Fall there is only a mere trickle of water to be seen. It naturally follows that the volume of the cataract also decreases greatly, and, in very cold weather, the Fall itself freezes so as to make it hard even to see a drop of water. At such times the Ashio power-house is only able to continue the generation of electricity by collecting various small streams trickling down the crevices of steep rocks and precipices—a most unsatisfactory method. It cannot therefore be held unreasonable to entertain the project of the Chuzenji-Kego aqueduct.

The small stream flowing out of Lake Chuzenji over the Kego Fall has a length of some 400 yards, with a drop of about 50 feet. The Ashio scheme is to make an underground duct, of iron piping or some other substantial material, in a straight line under the bed of the above stream, thus enabling the water of the Lake to be utilized to supplement the stream at the foot of the Fall, when the water of the upper stream decreases in volume or nearly dries up, in the winter season. The additional water thus obtained from the Lake by means of the duct would pour down in the form of a cataract and, swelling the volume of the Otani River, make its course to the Ashio Power house.

In these circumstances, as the project really involves a advantageous utilization of the water of Lake Chuzenji, it ought to be heartily approved. The carrying out of the scheme will of course effect a large increase in the output of refined copper, and will not only enhance the profits of the mine, but no small economic benefit will be received by the nation in general.

It is urged in some quarters that the proposed undertaking will be the beginning of the destruction of the world-renowned cataract. This is the superficial view of those who know little of the true state of affairs. Their anxiety is not unnatural, but quite uncalled for. As explained in the preceding paragraph, the subterranean aqueduct would pass from the Lake into the stream just before the latter reaches the edge of the Fall, so that the water flowing through the duct would mingle with that of the stream and of the cataract. (Vide the subjoined diagram). There is thus no reason to suppose that any harm would be done to the Fall. Moreover, it should be added that when the volume of water is comparatively large, as it is in the summer or rainy season, the aqueduct will not be made use of, for the water in the Lake at such seasons maintains a sufficiently high level. In the winter season, however, when there is sometimes scarcely a drop of water passing over the Fall, an artificial cataract may be formed with the aid of the duct, so that anyone visiting the Fall at that time of the year would not be disappointed. Is it not possible in this way to secure industrial advantage as well as to preserve the charms of nature?

While no reasonable person, therefore, will hesitate to express approbation of the project and a hope for its early completion, there is one thing to be carefully considered before setting to work. If the Ashio Mine Corporation should, without negotiating with the people, obtain the sanction of the authorities and exclusively appropriate the benefit, monopolizing the use of the new water-supply, it would provoke the resentment of the local people, so that the undertaking would end in failure owing to their opposition. The recent popular outcry probably originated in this circumstance. It is, therefore, suggested that the best measure to be taken by the Ashio Mine Corporation would be to bestow on the people of Nikko the right of using this water-power and to pay them annually a certain sum of money for the same. In this way the townspeople would substantially increase their resources, the heavy burden of their public expenses would be lightened and their welfare promoted by the allocation of a portion of the receipts to the improvement of communication, sanitation, and to various other essential purposes. On the part of the Ashio Mine, while a fixed amount of money would be paid to the townspeople, far greater profit can be realized though its increased output. If in this way the approval of the inhabitants is secured, the problem can be settled to the advantage of all concerned, and there is no fear of Lake Chuzenji drying up!

FINLAND AND ITS LOST CONSTITUTION.

A FEW FACTS ABOUT THE COUNTRY.

[WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL" BY A LATE RESIDENT.]

The following telegrams have appeared in the Japan Mail during the last two weeks.

After exciting debates the Russian Duma read a third time, by 164 to 23 votes, the bill which will largely subject Finland to Imperial Legislation.

Seven minutes sufficed in the Duma to move the abolition of the century old Finnish Constitution.

On the passing of the bill depriving Finland of her Autonomy, the Premier said that Finnish interests would be well represented as Finland would have five seats in the Duma. A member of the Opposition cried out, "Mockery!"

About 100 years ago, after the war between Sweden and Russia, Finland, which was previously Swedish territory, was ceded to Russia. Alexander the First, who was then Czar, gave the Finns special privileges, allowing them to have their own Diet and to govern the country in their own way. He also took a solemn oath, for himself and the Czars of Russia following him, to preserve these privileges. In the speech he made at the time, these notable words are handed down and well borne in mind by Finns. "Remember, you have this day become a nation, with a government, a language and an army of your own." One has only to live in Finland a short time to realize what good use the Finns have made of these privileges.

In the year 1906, contrary to the oaths of the Czars, Russia made an attempt to russianize Finland by compelling Finns to serve as conscripts in the Russian army, and filling all important official positions with Russians instead of Finns. This task was put into the hands of one, Bobrikoff, who was sent to Helsingfors, the capital, as Governor-General. The Finns, however, remained firm, and declared a General Strike. Very little of a revolutionary character took place, but the Finns simply sat down. Railways, Postal Services, Shipping, in fact everything was at a standstill. This state of affairs culminated in the assassination of Bobrikoff by a Finnish student at Helsingfors, and Russia, having her hands full, through internal trouble, reinstated the Finnish Officials, put a stop to all coercive measures, and gave the Finns back their autonomy as before, but disbanded their army. Everything went well after that, until the reactionary party in Russia began to come into power; since when everything possible has been done to irritate the Finns.

Not many months ago the Russian Government made an attempt to incorporate the province of Viborg, the largest in Finland, with Russia, sending additional troops there in case of disturbances; but owing to foreign capital being invested in the province, it was found impracticable, and the idea was abandoned pro tem. Although the Russian press denied these intentions, I know from good authority that the project was contemplated.

Since the disbanding of the Finnish army in 1906, the Finnish Government has paid something like 10 million marks annually in lieu of military service in the Russian army. This sum Russia wished to increase to something like 40 millions, but neither the First Diet nor the Senate would pass the necessary bill. Russia then appointed several Russians to the Senate and thus had her way after several parliaments had been dissolved, thus putting the country to great expense.

A few weeks ago an incident occurred in Abo, Finland, a town of about 40,000 inhabitants, which is typical of Russia's attitude towards Finland. There happened to be an exhibition of Japanese pictures in the town; one day some Russian officers visited it and objected to some of them, complaining to the Chief of Police—a Finn—who said he saw nothing objectionable about them and refused to have the exhibition closed. The Governor of Abo—also a Finn—supported the Chief of Police and was consequently called to Helsingfors, the capital, treated in a most contemptuous manner by the Governor-General and his underlings, and threatened with dismissal for contemning the exhibition. The result was that the Chief of Police was dismissed with a week's notice after years of faithful service. I had not heard before leaving Finland what was the fate of the Governor. This is only typical of a number of similar incidents.

Poor little Finland! Misunderstood by most nations though the articles in the papers inspired by Russia, its conditions unknown by the majority of people, because of the few foreigners who ever visit it! A little country, struggling for self-respect and progress; always menaced by a master jealous of her superior culture, prosperity and general well-being.

There is a picture, a print of which nearly every Finnish home possesses—carefully hidden away in many cases, as it is treated as a revolutionary document—of a woman with long flowing hair, holding an open book convulsively to her breast; despair is written on her face as she looks up and sees a Black Eagle swooping down on to her to tear the book from her hands. This is very emblematic of the position of Finland as regards her relations with Russia to-day. Finland has a splendid system of education, with schools for the blind, the deaf and dumb, under government control, 90 per cent. of the population being able to read and write; whereas in Russia it is only about 10 per cent., education for the people being largely under the control of the priests, to whose advantage it is to keep the masses ignorant.

Walk through any town in Finland of from 2,000 to 40,000 inhabitants, you will see the streets clean and well kept, the houses in good repair; modern sanitary arrangements; children going to or from school, clean, healthy, intelligent and happy looking; youths and girls of the better classes, well dressed going to or from the "Lyceum;" the working people clean and industrious. Walk through a town of the same size in Russia, and the contrast is nothing short of appalling, when you keep before you the fact that Finland is a dependency of Russia, and not the reverse; the streets—in wet weather—thick with mud, with here and there deep holes, and practically no attempt to keep the roads in order; dirty looking uncared-for children; hopeless looking men and women of the working classes, loafing about doing nothing; houses, filthy and in terrible disrepair; no sign of school life; wretched looking shops; everywhere evidences of the most awful poverty and stagnation; but always plenty of soldiers. And this is the country which, scarcely able to govern itself, intends to deprive a little country, which governs itself remarkably well, of the blessings of self-government—contrary to the oaths of the Czars of Russia since Alexander I., to preserve the constitution of Finland. If Finland had governed itself badly, not developing its resources etc., there would be some excuse for Russia; but, as matters stand, it is no credit to civilization that such an action should be contemplated, almost without comment by the rest of the world. Of course, all Russians are not in sympathy with the Government in its attitude towards Finland, and the majority of Russians—I know this for a fact—know no more of Finland, the people and their conditions than the average foreigner, and that is next to nothing.

To put the case clearly, it is as if England, after having given, say, South Africa self-government for 100 years, during which time she had acquitted herself remarkably well, suddenly for no plausible reason decided to withdraw the Constitution and turn it into a Crown colony.

At intervals one reads in the English papers (and I suppose it is the same in other countries)—of depots of arms being discovered; of revolutions breaking out, or about to break out, in various parts of the country; occasionally even long articles—doubtless, inspired by Russia—are written about the unrest in Finland; while the Finns themselves are going about their daily work in total ignorance of anything of the sort. It would be really humorous, were it not so tragic.

TOKIKO: THE STORY OF A TOKYO GEISHA.

(TRANSLATED FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL" FROM THE JAPANESE OF SOJINKAN.)

I.

THE TELEPHONE.

I forget the exact day, but it was somewhere in the spring of the year before last. I was on night duty at the office and was just preparing to turn in to the apology for a bed, which was all the office provided for me. I had finished my article for the morrow's issue of the paper and my conscience was quite tranquil, when suddenly I was startled by a violent ring of the telephone.

It was about one o'clock a.m., the office-boys had gone home long since, and there was no one within call. So I went to the telephone myself and applied the receiver to my ear.

Judge of my astonishment. It was the soft voice of a woman.

"If Mr. Suzuki is in the office," said the voice, "would you mind calling him to the telephone?"

"I am Suzuki," I replied.

"No, really? Are you the Suzuki of your office?"

I remembered having read how proud the Vicar of Wakefield had been when some one asked him if he were "the Dr. Primrose." I did not feel proud: I was rather annoyed at the repetitions of the question. It seemed like doubting my word.

"Do you know who I am?" said the voice presently, after its owner had satisfied herself as to my identity. I inferred, from the tone of the voice and the hour of my summons, that the speaker was a geisha.

Now I am not exactly a prude. I cannot say that I have absolutely no acquaintances amongst girls of this sort. Neither am I a fūryūka, a man about town who knows the whole class intimately from constant association. There are thousands of geisha in Tokyo; how was I to know, through the telephone, which of them all had honoured me with a summons?

So I replied truthfully that I did not.

Then she whispered her name in a low tone, "I am Tokiko," she said.

And Tokiko was a girl I knew.

II.

TOKIKO.

A few years ago, shortly after the outbreak of the war with Russia, I happened to be supping at a restaurant near Yanagibashi with two or three of my parliamentary friends. Tokiko was one of the geisha that served us on that occasion, and, somehow or other, her name had fixed itself in my memory. She was above the average height, a pretty girl with large eyes and a good complexion and there were signs of determination and character about her face. Her voice was clear and sweet, but every now and again a piece of Nagoya brogue would slip out inadvertently, much to one's amusement, and whenever we laughed at her she would laugh back in a most good-humoured way. We were making picture post-cards to send to our friends, everyone present adding a stroke or two to embellish or disfigure the pictures, as the case might be, and Tokiko's fountain pen got out of order. I remember that I set it to rights again, and whilst I was thus engaged I had an opportunity of talking to her. We discussed fountain-pens.

After that I often met her. I saw her once, with several of her friends, at a wrestling at the Ekō-en, and I was much astonished when she gave me a friendly nod right across the amphitheatre. I had always understood that at such places of public resort, a geisha did her best to be as inconspicuous as possible. Somehow I seemed to hear a good deal about her. She was a very good dancer, I was told, sang well, and played on the samisen. When she could spare the time, she would put on a simple cotton dress and go for a lesson in some useful accomplishment —tea-making or flower-arrangement. She had even learned a little English, and my informants always spoke of her as an ideal geisha, accomplished and agreeable, and rare good company.

I heard, too, that unlike many of her class, she had always known how to keep herself above reproach. She was a thoroughly pure-minded girl, and for that very reason was a favourite with her customers. I had at first some difficulty in believing this, but everyone told me the same story, so I accepted it as true.

She had yet another distinction. She sent her brother to school. The lad was now at the High School, but it was Tokiko's intention to see him right through his University course. She wanted, she said, to make a gentleman of him. At the same time her brother had no idea whose hand it was that gave him constant support. The lad's sense of honour might be hurt, she said, if he knew he was being kept by a geisha.

III.

SUSPICION.

"I am exceedingly sorry to trouble you about such a thing" was Tokiko's introductory apology to me over the telephone; "but——"

And then she went on to tell me her story.

It appeared that, two days before, an article about her had appeared in a yellow journal. The paper in question had said nothing but good about her, but her mistress, the old lady to whom she was as it were in bonds, had come in for a good deal of blame. Tokiko had seen the offending article and had at once torn up the paper for fear it should come into the hands of her mistress, but some mischievous person had cut out the article and sent it to one of Tokiko's rivals, who had out of spite shown it to Tokiko's mistress.

Now the old lady was very angry. She said that Tokiko must have sent that communication to the newspaper herself. Who but Tokiko could have known so well the details of the household management, and why should she have torn up the paper which contained the articles? It was clear that Tokiko herself had given the information. Tokiko's rivals were overjoyed, and egged on her mistress with their insinuations.

"What am I to do?" asked Tokiko, when she had finished her story. I could feel that she was weeping at the other end of the telephone.

Our conversation went on. The girl at the telephone-exchange grew impatient and more than once interrupted us with her usual complaint, O hanashi chū desu ka? "Are you still talking?" The work of type-setting was over, and I could hear the thud of the mallets beating the papier maché moulds.

"Please give me a good hearing," the voice pleaded. "I have had some difficulty in making this opportunity for a talk." And she began again to pour out her woes.

I felt the deepest sympathy for the girl, but I did not see how I could help her. I asked her what she wanted me to do, and she replied that she wanted me to find out who was the author of that paragraph, so that she might prove to her mistress that she was not responsible for it. "And I may as well tell you," she added, "that you are also suspected of having written it." This quasi-postscript rather alarmed me.

I had often had a foolish ambition. I had often thought how interesting it would be to have a paragraph about myself appear in some yellow paper, accusing me of some intrigue or criminal act. I used to picture myself meeting such a charge with the dignity of conscious integrity, and metaphorically annihilating my slanderers with my noble indignation. I was getting my ambition realized. "You also are suspected," said the girl. I felt uncomfortable. I was not nearly so brave as I thought I was.

I readily promised to give the girl the help she asked, partly indeed out of sympathy for her, but much more so from a prudent desire to save my own skin, and to clear my reputation. At last the telephone was rung off. The paper had by this time gone to press, and the machines were running cheerily.

KING EDWARD AND HIS PEOPLE.

(FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.)

Nearly four weeks have passed since the death of King Edward VII., and Time, which is perhaps the greatest militant power in the world, has already begun to do its work.

Time has blunted the sharp edge of national grief. Time has calmed the storm of national excitement and dismay. Time has brought forth a quieter and more rational regret sweetened by a deep sense of gratitude. Time has given opportunity for the formation of a just appreciation of all that this country has lost in King Edward's character and personality, his patriotism and labours, of all that this country has gained through his governance and of that which it still possesses in the fruit of the Good Deeds which he has left behind him. Besides all this Time has in a manner forced the observer to take note of the attitude and bearing of the English People in their period of bereavement, to gauge the national spirit by its expression and to deduce such an estimate of the national character as he may.

Upon the subject of King Edward's character and achievements there has been written and spoken a truly vast amount. There exists a huge body of public opinion and hearsay, in which things wise and foolish, true and false, are most strangely mingled. The important features of this great mass, the facts which dominate and persist, appear to be as follows. The King's greatness lay not in the transcendent quality of his virtues and his attributes, but in the unique manner of their combination! He was neither a universal genius, nor an Archangel, but he was essentially the right man in the right place. "The elements were so mixed in him" that, "take him all in all, we shall never look upon his like again." He was the friend of his people as well as their ruler, he was the most popular man in the world. The fact that for some years he had never been toasted either in France or in the United States of America otherwise than simply as "the King" speaks volumes in itself.

A writer in the June number of Blackwood's Magazine points out the peculiar qualities of King Edward's excellence:—

"The lesson of his influence is a lesson of humanity. We shall do no discredit if we acknowledge that he was not a statesman of the highest rank. He had not the grasp and foresight of Bismarck. He did not form an imaginative conception of foreign policies. It was not for him to foretell the future or to work for the millenium. But he saw with a rare lucidity what lay immediately in front of him. He disliked the strife of countries as bitterly as he disliked the conflict of parties, and he believed always that more might be done by accommodation than by force. In other words he was determined to approach foreign countries in the same spirit as he would approach his friends."

By this spirit, simple, friendly and firm, King Edward assisted materially in keeping the peace of the world. He created relationships such as now exist between England and France, or England and Russia, which continue to be of enormous gain, satisfaction and profit to this country.

"If he had not the mightier attributes of Kingship, if it was not given to him to ride at the head of a victorious army, or to dominate the Councils of the State with his own imperious policy, he showed what no other King has ever shown, that a finished man of the world may interpose upon ground too dangerous for the political philosopher, and that even in the hostile atmosphere of foreign courts, manners still make men.

From far and near the tributes have poured in, tributes to the character of the King and to his "blessed and glorious memory." The great ones of the earth have spoken, Kings and Emperors, soldiers and statesmen, churchmen and poets. The people of England, one and all, have striven to express their sorrow and respect, each in his own way, from the highest noble in the land to the London slum child with a scrap of crepe tied into his ragged buttonhole. The House of Lords delivered its message through Lord Crewe. In the House of Commons both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition spoke at length, and for once in perfect accord.

"He well earned the title," said Mr. Asquith, "by which he will always be remembered: The Peacemaker of the World."

Mr. Balfour referred to the power "which enabled the King by the perfect simplicity of his personality to make all men love him and understand him." He proceeded: "I think no mere attempt at analysing character, no weighing of merits, no attempt to catalogue great gifts really touches the root of that great secret which has made King Edward one of the most beloved monarchs that have ever ruled over this Empire. This power of communicating with all mankind, the power of bringing them into sympathy, is surely the most Kinglike of all qualities."

Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and India gave tokens of their great mourning. France knew that she had lost a good friend, and a wave of sympathy swept over the country, the like of which has seldom been witnessed in a foreign land on any similar occasion.

"He was a great King of England, and our tried and trusted friend."

"We had come to regard him as if he were one of ourselves."

"He is mourned in France as if he were one of our greatest citizens."

Thus spoke the French people.

There was sorrow in all the Courts of Europe.

In Russia there was something like consternation. M. Isvolsky said: "We have lost the mainstay of our foreign policy." There was mourning, too, in the far countries of the East. Persia and China sent their tribute, and the message came from Tokyo: "The Japanese nation is profoundly moved by the death of King Edward. The Press declares that no more poignant sorrow would have been felt by the people over their own Sovereign's demise. No previous ruler, say the newspapers, achieved so much for the benefit of humanity in so short a time, and the nations can only bow their heads in silent sorrow. King Edward deserved to be called a God of Peace and a model among wise rulers. The influence of his beneficent life will long remain active, though the tomb encloses his body. The Anglo-Japanese Alliance was the first stone in his Temple of Peace. Japan hopes that the Alliance will be permanently preserved as a reverent memento of his illustrious deeds."

Upon the Sunday following King Edward's death the people, possessed by a universal instinct, flocked to Church with one accord, till great and smaller buildings overflowed. There the King was remembered in prayer and in sacred song, and illustrious Churchmen spoke of him and his deeds to the quiet multitudes assembled. Among others the sermon delivered by the Archbishop at Westminster Abbey will long be remembered.

The poets of the land have not been mute. Mr. Austin Dobson's "In memoriam" is both touching and graceful:—

"He that was King an hour ago
Is King no more, and we who bend
Beside the bier, both high and low
Have lost a friend.
His was no blood and iron blend
To write in tears a ruthless reign;
Rather he strove to make an end
Of strife and pain.

Thus though no trophies deck his car
Of captured guns or banners torn,
Men hailed him as they hail a star
That comes with morn.

Mr. Kipling sings in a more heroic strain; but in spirit his poem "The Dead King" is thoroughly representative.

Who in the realm to-day lays down dear life
For the sake of a land more dear,
And, unconcerned for his own estate, toils till
The last grudging sands have run?
Let him approach. It is proven here
Our King asks nothing of any man more Than our King himself has done

The King's opportunities and the use he made of them are finely described:—

"The peculiar treasure of Kings was his for the taking. All that men come to in dreams he inherited waking."

Yet:

"As he received, so he gave—nothing grudged,

nought denying,

Not even the last gasp of his breath when he strove for us dying.

For our sakes, without question, he put from him all that he cherished.

Simply as any that serve him, he served and he perished.

All that Kings covet was his, and he flung it aside for us.

Simply as any that die in his service he died for us."

Now to turn to the second office of powerful Time, as spoken of above. Time has given opportunity to the observer to take note of the attitude of the English People, in this their period of calamity. And first of all, with the deepest feeling of thankfulness, let it be said that above all things the people have expressed their loyalty. That fact is beyond question, and at a time when rebellion is in the air, with discontent against the old order, when freedom from all restraint is acclaimed as the greatest good, when selfishness and covetousness are encouraged together with an undisciplined mode of life, when sacrifice and patriotism are ridiculed and decried, this unmistakable loyalty of the people as a whole comes as the greatest comfort and reassurance to those who love England. It is the fine fruit of the ages, the result of centuries of glorious history. It is a proof that a long line of Kings have not lived and died in vain, that blood has not been shed and battles won for nothing, and that Sacred Tradition is no empty name. Individually the English people mourn a friend, nationally they honour a Dead King. This was very plainly shown, and it was indeed expedient that it should be so. And because they have done what was essential and have expressed their loyalty with no uncertain tongue, much must be pardoned the people.

The ancient pomp and circumstance attendant upon King Edward's death, the solemn pageant of his lying in state and his funeral, the Heralds, the company of Kings, the gorgeous colour, the strange aspect of the London streets, these things took the imagination of the people. England was awed, for her a most excellent experience. Half-a-million people passed through Westminster Hall to pay their final homage to the mortal remains of the King.

Through long hours of weary waiting and discomfort the crowd was orderly, reverent, patient beyond praise, dignified, proud of their great privilege. A London working-girl, frail and wretchedly clad, half child, half woman, watched with wide eyes the stately procession leaving Westminster Hall, after having left the Dead King there. "Now they have given him to us" she said, and voiced the sentiment of the nation. "King Edward's funeral on May 20th provided another memorable pageant for which the public began to assemble shortly after midnight" says the National Review. "The coffin, placed on a gun-carriage, drawn by a detachment of the Royal Horse Artillery, was preceded by representative naval and military units, headed by massed bands, which were followed by the special deputations representing foreign armies and navies, after which came distinguished British soldiers, including Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener, followed by the Commander-in-Chief of the Royal Navy, the Admirals of the Fleet, the Board of Admiralty and the late King's Aides de-Camp. The immediate cortege about the gun-carriage was headed by the Earl Marshal, while immediately behind the coffin came the King's personal Aide-de-Camp, Prince Louis of Battenburg, the Royal Charger and the Royal Standard. . . . On King George's right rode King Edward's nephew the German Emperor, on his left the Duke of Connaught. The other Sovereigns were the King of Greece, the King of Spain, the King of Norway, the King of Denmark, King of Portugal, the King of Bavaria and the King of the Belgians, in order of their accession. Immediately behind present Kings rode future Kings, for example, the hereditary Prince of the Ottoman Empire and the Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria. Japan was represented by Prince Fushimi, the Tsar of Russia by his brother, the Grand Duke Michael, and the King of Italy by his kinsman the Duc d'Aosta. There were many other princes attended by their suites. The first Carriage, which was the cynosure of all eyes, conveyed the Queen-Mother, her sister, the Empress Marie of Russia, the Princess Royal and Princess Victoria. The second carriage contained Her Majesty the Queen, the Queen of Norway, the young Duke of Cornwall and his sister Princess. Slowly and sadly this mournful and brilliant procession filed through the streets of London, lined by 30,000 troops and packed with myriads of people, amid the booming of minute guns and the tolling of Big Ben. From Paddington the coffin and the principal mourners went by train to Windsor, where there was another procession to St. George's Chapel, and at the close of a beautiful service the coffin was lowered amid the singing of the anthem "His body is buried in peace; but his name liveth for evermore."

The great wave of popular feeling reached its high-water mark upon the day of the King's funeral. It is impossible now not to mark the backwash, and just as a receding wave of the sea leaves its sticks and straw and seaweed on the sand, trifling matters now appear upon the surface which were not thought of before. For the most part they are trifling indeed. The British public are human after all. It is to be regretted that they had so moderate an appreciation of their late King's excellences whilst he yet lived amongst them, that their overwhelming sense of gratitude and love should have been developed only when he died, that their loyalty should have found its supreme expression "too late." In these short-comings, they are very British and very human, and it is ill to blame nature or nationality. Neither does the state of mind call for anxiety which is manifested in the fact that people who were willing to take any sort of mourning and wear it as long as it was mourning, are now sending their garments back to the shops for extensive and minute alterations. This merely betokens a condition of inevitable and quite harmless reaction. The writer in a ladies' journal, who begins an article "Women are now turning their thoughts very seriously to the subject of demi-deuil" is guilty of nothing worse than an error in taste. But amongst many trifles there are some things—there are above all two things—which give pause. There have appeared Selfishness and Exaggeration. The growth of these truly baleful and dangerous qualities is due in no small measure to the fostering of a section of the Press, deplorably foolish if it is no worse. Making full allowance for the strain upon tired writers by protracted public functions, it is impossible to forgive this section of the Press that can never let well alone, that holds nothing sacred, that ruthlessly destroys delicate relationships and deceives and bewilders countless simple minds.

To give a single example of how selfishness has been encouraged: from the day of his illustrious father's death King George has shown himself most wise and kind in his consideration of his subjects. He has taken pains to make the burden of the national mourning weigh as light as possible in each department, and to avoid as far as possible, pecuniary loss. In spite of all this, it appears that people are not satisfied, and agitation has been got up on behalf of the sellers of materials and articles of dress of all kinds, and sympathy has been aroused for them on account of their enormous losses. Letters, tasteless and ill-timed, have appeared in the public prints, and the result has been a somewhat curt order shortening the period of mourning by a month. The agitation was really uncalled for, as a little commonsense at once shows.

The great buying time of the public was over before the nation was thrown into mourning. To put it in a homely way, people both small and great had already bought their summer clothes. Then there came, of course, the enormous sales of mourning, which shopkeepers seem to leave entirely out of count. Certainly people are not buying coloured clothes now, but they are buying black clothes. Soon will come the time of the annual American invasion of London, and then the "Summer Sales", whose wily patrons will certainly not confine themselves to "Black Bargains." Over and above all this, when the period of mourning is over, entirely new wardrobes will be purchased to replace those set aside, and now neither fresh nor fashionable any more. Taking these into consideration it may be decided that shopkeepers might have kept to themselves such of complaint as they had.

The exaggeration indulged in by many newspapers is more regrettable still.

To praise the many excellent virtues of our beloved King, who is dead, is just and right; but to persist in ascribing to him qualities which he did not possess is hypocritical, insulting and dangerous. And so, in one instance at least, it has been proved. The newspapers have emphasized so excessively and injudiciously King Edward's position with regard to Foreign Politics that cause has been given for serious misapprehension. Mr. F. W. Jowett, the well-known labour member, writes in the Labour Leader :—

I feel it my duty to point that however worthy, able or wise the occupant of the Throne for the time being may be, it is against the interest of the people in the long run to fall into the habit of allowing the work that Ministers should do to be transferred to the Crown. It is the duty of Ministers to retain absolutely and continue those usages which until recently gave to this country all the advantages of a monarchy without its disadvantages. I object to the foreign policy of this country being directed from a source which it is impossible to criticise.

Sooner or later the King who acts wisely will be succeeded by one who acts foolishly or disastrously, and the people's rights, such as they are, have been won too dearly to be given away.

The spirit of these remarks is perfectly wise and just. King Edward himself would have been the first to agree with it. Their application to the present situation is founded upon a misapprehension, created by such of our newspapers as have neither honesty nor self-control.

OUR BERLIN LETTER.

HERR DERNBURG.

(FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin, June 13.

Dernburg, Colonial secretary, just "promoted" to that new independence which the Reichstag refused to poor Richthofen (and killed him with a dog's praise) stood when I first spoke to him with his back to a long table in the supper-room where he was amongst a number of English guests. He had an unfinished glass of beer at his left elbow and a telegraph-form in his right hand. I had asked him for a message for England. "I think I won't" he said. "They would hardly understand what I would like to say. And I cannot say what they would understand." Somehow now that the "draufgaenger" (translate me that word! perhaps "Mr. Goahead" is nearest.) has quit in his own way a thankless task, one recalls the significant remark of the man who cannot say what they understand and who is not understood when he does say something to the purpose. Dernburg, ex-colonial-secretary, was partly at the outset a concession to Industrialism (never to liberalism!) and partly the second German experiment in Business-politicians. Herr von Möller was the first experiment and his official death was due to his advocacy, as Minister of Commerce, of Industrial Rings—or if you prefer it, of Cartels or even Trusts. Dernburg was the second and his political death is due to his advocacy of big concerns for big undertakings. What the German colonies wanted when Dernburg, colonial adviser, was appointed was capital. Dernburg got it and having got it felt bound to protect the interests of the men who on his personal advice had invested large sums in "desert tracts" which the stay-at-homes wanted to sell at a knock-down price to great Britain. Capital, inspired by Dernburg, built railways through a desert which had water a few feet under the surface: capital stocked the farms ruined by the war: capital sent experts to examine the "blue ground:" capital found diamonds and turned the worthless South West African colony into the chiefest jewel in the colonial crown.

But Dernburg was suspect. Up to his appointment he was mildly a radical and violently a "draufgaenger." "Reichs-sanierungs-rat" they called him in mockery, "Imperial counsellor for Cleaning Things Up": he cleaned up a bank smash, then mended a colony. Exit! "He was and is a radical and has no place in the blue-black block-government."

Well, one can see that he was no longer possible. The Catholic centre in common decency had to try to get rid of him for his speeches against them before the elections of 1907. No political party can stand being told that their influence is a "poisonous gathering which must be treated with the surgeon's knife." In April, they made an attack on him under the ægis of the excellent Herr Erzberge. But the conservatives did not feel sure enough of their game to follow that trump-lead then. A week or two later they "learned from a reliable source" that the excellent gentleman from Hohen Finow with his rueful countenance and austere manners would let Dernburg go without creating a scandal. So Dernburg understood that the time had come. He took a fortnight's leave of absence and—did not return.

Let it be admitted that without Dernburg influence on capital S. W. Africa might still be a weary waste of sand and the diamonds as illusory as his own cases of palms sprung from cases of dried dates. Still he was an experiment. Germany and for that matter German colonies are run by officials . . . the more the merrier. If you suddenly plant a bank-director in an office and he causes dignified gentlemen to hurry away from breakfast on the ground that if they are not punctual they will get the official notice that they may as well look for something less exhausting than their present job: if you stir up a hornets' nest with a long pole, or if you take away the Times of this morning from the clerk in one or two London public offices we could mention, you must expect trouble. Dernburg's crime when you get down to the bottom of it is that of removing the Times from the leisurely clerk in the X.Y.Z.-office. "Clericals, agrarians, bureaucrats, . . . all had a bone to pick with Dernburg. They have picked it. The combination was too strong for the man who played Skat without understanding the game." So wrote a little country paper in Schleswig and perhaps hit on the truth. People who had been accustomed to the bureaucratic way of doing things for thirty years could not so easily learn a new method. Or, if you prefer it, new wine should not be fermented in old skins! This generation will doubtless see no more commercial experiments.

But Dernburg's fall leaves the Chancellor somewhat uncovered. (Castle before the first check! Bethmann Hollweg has already appealed to the Emperor against his enemies and received the usual invitation to dinner.) And against the Rueful Knight of Hohen Finow the accusations are steadily growing. It is enough that I recount them in order. Here is the bill of indictment.

"In twelve months this philosopher has so decreased the reputation of the Imperial and Prussian governments as no German before him. The time to make at least a tolerable agreement with England was let slip: in the Moroccan matter this genius took the standpoint of the strictly interpreted law (was ever German helped by the strict interpretation of a law? of the letter of a law? Not so was the empire made.) Worse than Algéciras! Then defeat was disguised in clever language, now it is naked and unashamed. Next, for five months Hollweg lets the Prussian parliament turn inside out a measure whereon crown and government has placed their seal. Socialist meetings are first forbidden, then permitted. Twelve months of weakness and inconsistency and Germany and her fair fame lower than ever Hohenlohe or Bülow brought it. Autumn, winter, spring, not one single act an unprejudiced observer could approve! not one trace of confidence through the length of Germany! So lonely, so deserted was never German Chancellor before. One only possibility remains to him to make his bureaucratic sense serviceable to his country: he can quit the Sphere of Service wherein only a man's will served by a brave creative mind can do good work!"

Fine words but . . . one finds a difficulty. If ever there was a man in this modern Germany whose will was served by a creative mind it was Bernhard Dernburg. And he has gone out. The philosopher of Hohen Finow will perhaps not serve the State but at least he will not create trouble with the bureaucrats. So belike they will suffer him to remain.

Which is really all our news. Unless I must add again that the public is really not interested in the Encyclical controversy. It has become a political stick wherewith to beat the Conservatives for their alliance with the Catholic centre. The Kultur-Kampf is "still dead."

THE LAW COURT.

G BERTAZZOLI vs. BAVIER & Co.

FACTS.

Plaintiff's counsel in reply to defendant's counsel admits that the waste silk business of the defendant company is the most important one that is carried on by the latter, and that the Société Industrielle pour la Schappe are the only important customers of the defendant company. Plaintiff's counsel also admits the fact that Mr. Koch, the expert despatched to Yokohama by the said Society, notified the defendant company on the 6th October, 1909, to the effect that unless the defendant company immediately severed the business relationship with plaintiff, he (Koch) would telegraph to the above said Society requesting to be recalled home. The counsel, however, contends that as result of plaintiff having taught Koch, in accordance with the Convention agreed upon between plaintiff and the defendant company on the 8th October, 1907, how to purchase and how to inspect waste silk, Koch made considerable progress in these branches, so that the defendant company thought that their interests would not suffer even though plaintiff might be turned out, and they (defendant company) were waiting for an opportunity to dismiss him on some pretext or other. At that juncture the above said notification from Koch to the defendant company was sent in either on Koch's own initiative or owing to the defendant company having intentionally made Koch sent in such letter. The defendant company, pleading this as an unavoidable circumstance, cancelled plaintiff's agreement without giving any compensation, and in the meantime made use of Koch, to whom they were under no obligation to pay any salary. No actual unavoidable circumstances existed. With a view to proving this, plaintiff's counsel produced Exhibits Nos. 1 to 34 A and asked the Court to summon Mr. Strahler as a witness. He also asked the Court to have the meaning of the word "Dismiss," in Exhibit No. 13 A, defined by an expert witness. The existence of Exhibit No. 2 B is not admitted by plaintiff's counsel, while as to Exhibits Nos. 2, 12, 14, and 16 B, he states he does not know, but he admits the existence of the rest of the numbers of Exhibit B.

Defendant's counsel has filed a statement requesting the Court to dismiss the claims of plaintiff and to order plaintiff to bear the costs of the action; and in reply to plaintiff's counsel, he (defendant's counsel) said that he admits the conclusion of the contract of engagement referred to between plaintiff and the defendant company, and the fact that the defendant company dismissed plaintiff on the 6th October, 1909. Defendant's counsel, however, contended that

(1) The plaintiff was discharged owing to unavoidable circumstances. The waste silk department of the defendant company was originally the most important portion of the company's business, and the Société Industrielle pour la Schappe were the chief customers of the said waste silk department. During March 1907 the defendant company entered into an agreement with the Society in connection with supplying waste silk, and in accordance with this agreement it was decided that the said Society would send an expert to the defendant company in order to let him take part in purchasing and inspecting waste silk. T. Koch came to Yokohama as the said expert. As plaintiff began to make complaints in connection with the above said agreement and with Koch, the expert, the defendant company, under the provision of the clause in the contract of engagement that plaintiff provided to execute scrupulously the orders and instructions received from the defendant company, drew up a special convention with plaintiff on the 1st September, 1907, in which convention it was stated that in case of buying waste silk on account of the Société Industrielle pour la Schappe plaintiff and Koch should attend to the business consulting with each other and in harmonious coöperation. Plaintiff, however, was disposed not to observe the said convention, and behaved in a haughty manner to Koch, irritating the latter so much, that in October 1909 he wrote to the defendant company to the effect that unless they severed business relations with plaintiff, he (Koch) would decidedly return home. Prior to this event the defendant company carefully and quietly admonished plaintiff in different ways to observe strictly the said convention, in order to prevent friction between the two parties. In spite of this, plaintiff would not yield, and at length Koch determined to return home. The defendant company, fearing that they would lose the support of the Société Industrielle, their only important customer, unavoidably released plaintiff. This discharge was nothing but the cancellation of contract of engagement due to unavoidable circumstances provided under the provisions of Art. 628 of the Civil Code. Accordingly the defendant company's declaration of their intention to cancel the contract is valid and not unlawful, as argued by plaintiff's counsel.

(2) In the case of the non-fulfilment of contract by reason attributed to the responsibility of an obligor it is a matter of course that the claimant can cancel the contract. But in the contract of engagement referred to in this action, plaintiff should tender his services, so that he is the obligor in this contract. Therefore, assuming that the defendant company made it impossible for plaintiff to tender his services, it is needless to say that the latter has no right to cancel the contract on that ground. In this case the obligor cannot fulfil the contract by reason attributed to the responsibility of the claimant, so that plaintiff, the obligor, has only the right to receive a grant from the defendant company provided under the provisions of Art. 536, clause 2, of the Civil Code, and is not allowed to bring the right of cancellation into force. Accordingly the plaintiff's declaration of his intention to cancel the contract in the action is not lawful.

(3) The claim of compensation for damage is not necessarily attended by cancellation of contract, so that even though compensation for damage is claimed, it cannot at once be understood that the declaration of intention to cancel a contract is necessarily implied. There must exist some other reason that may be taken as the declaration of intention to cancel the contract. Although the written complaint of this action is no doubt a declaration of intention to claim compensation for damage, such declaration cannot be understood to cancel the contract.

(4) In accordance with the article in the contract of engagement referred to in this action, the allowances of net profits that plaintiff received from the defendant company were 8,247.44 yen in 1907-1908 and 10,190 yen in 1908-1909. On this point there is a mistake in the amount calculated by plaintiff.

(5) Although it is admitted that the defendant company notified their customers in Japan to the effect that plaintiff had been discharged, and that the word "dismissed," meaning removed from service, was used in the notice, the said word "dismiss" does not imply the sense, as plaintiff's counsel persists, of damaging one's reputation. The word has no other meaning but "to remove from service."

(6) Assuming that the word "dismiss" bears a derogatory meaning and that the action of notifying the customers of the plaintiff's dismissal by using the said word is unlawful, the representative of the defendant is responsible for the use of the word and not the company itself. The latter being a juridical person, is not responsible for its representative's unlawful action, so that the plaintiff's claim of compensation for damage which is said to have been due to injuring his reputation, is not reasonable.

In order to prove the above statements, defendants' counsel produced Exhibits Nos. 1 to 20 B, asked the Court to summon the witness F. Koch, and also to have the word "dismiss" defined by an expert witness. As to Exhibits Nos. 14, 15, 20, 21, 22, 26, and 27 A, defendants' counsel said he "does not know," while he admits the existence of the rest of the numbers of Exhibit A.

As to the claim of compensation for damage, which is due to the non-fulfilment of the contract of engagement, the Court has restricted the arguments relating to the existence of causes to that effect.

REASONS.

(1) The parties concerned in this action do not dispute the existence of the contract of engagement, the contents of which are as asserted by plaintiff, and also in respect of the defendants' declaration against plaintiff of their intention to cancel the said contract. The principal point of dispute in this action is whether the cancellation of contract was or was not due to unavoidable circumstances. The following facts are not disputed by the parties concerned. That an agreement relating to the supply of waste silk, as per Exhibit No. 18 A, was concluded during March 1907 between the defendant company and the Société Industrielle pour la Schappe; that in accordance with the above said agreement, the said Society sent F. Koch to the defendant company in order to coöperate on equal terms with the waste silk inspector of the defendant company in making purchases of waste silk on the said Society's account; that plaintiff made a special agreement with the defendant company on the 1st Sept., 1907, to the effect that he would work in coöperation with Koch in making purchases and in inspecting waste silk on account of the Société Industrielle; and that on the 6th October, 1909, Koch sent a letter to the defendant company stating that unless the latter severed business relations with plaintiff, Koch would assuredly return home. On making inquiries into the cause that induced Koch to take the above-mentioned action, it may be admitted, putting together the statement given by the witness Koch and the letters (Exhibit Nos. 17 and 18 B) addressed to plaintiff from E. D. Bavier, registered representative of the defendant company, that plaintiff and Koch could not attend business in coöperation, so that Koch requested the defendant company to ask plaintiff to work harmoniously with him (Koch) in accordance with the convention agreed upon between plaintiff and the defendant company. It is also seen that the defendant company, fearing to hurt Koch's feelings, requested plaintiff to fulfil the promise he had made.

According to the statement made by the witness S. F. Strahler, it must be admitted that the arbitration procedure commenced between plaintiff and the defendant company, during which process the latter requested plaintiff through the arbitrators to acknowledge the items mentioned in Exhibit No. 1 B, and at the same time the defendant company acknowledged those items mentioned in Exhibit No. 2 B, which was drawn up after being revised by the arbitrators. Nevertheless plaintiff refused the defendant company's request. Thus it seems proper to admit that plaintiff's refusal caused Koch to write such letter as above mentioned to the defendant company. Plaintiff's counsel produced Exhibit Nos. 16, 17, 20, 21, 22 and 26 A to prove that no friction existed between plaintiff and Koch. But these numbers of Exhibit A may be taken as proof that there was no friction between the said two parties as far as friendly relations were concerned, while it is difficult to conclude that no friction existed between the said two parties in respect of business relations. Plaintiff's counsel pleads that the defendant company desired to turn out plaintiff before the said letter from Koch had been received, so that it seems the defendant company was waiting for an opportunity to dismiss plaintiff at that time, or they intentionally induced Koch to send in such letter as aforesaid to them. It can, however, be proved by Exhibit No. 5 B that the defendant company had previously no intention to dismiss plaintiff, and it is shown by the defendant company's declaration made to the arbitrators that they (the defendant company) were not unwilling so take plaintiff again into service, if the latter would only acknowledge what is mentioned in Exhibit No. 1 B as well as the revised items in Exhibit No. 2 B. If Koch's letter addressed to the defendant company had originated in such circumstances as advocated by plaintiff's counsel, it must be disproved, otherwise it is impossible to conceive that the defendant company intentionally fabricated an excuse for cancelling the contract.

The fact that the Société Industrielle pour la Schappe were the most and only important customers of the waste silk department of the defendant company is not only admitted by plaintiff's counsel, but it can also be inferred from Exhibits No. 19 a and b, and the statement made by the witness Koch. The latter's statement also shows that if he, the expert sent out by the Société Industrielle to the defendant company, had returned home on account of plaintiff's annoyance, the business relations between the Société Industrielle and the defendant company would have been discontinued. Ordinary people may admit it. As was the case, it may be easily seen that the defendant company were compelled to ingratiate themselves with Koch and to dismiss plaintiff in order that Koch should remain in Yokohama so that the business connections with the Société Industrielle might be continued. Accordingly, it is reasonably interpreted that the defendant company's cancellation of the contract with plaintiff was due to unavoidable circumstances. As there is no dispute between the parties concerned in respect of application of the provisions under the Civil Code to the contract of engagement, the cancellation of the said contract is lawful, the defendant company being possessed of that right according to Art. 628 of the Civil Code. But if there had been any fault on the part of the defendant company in connection with unavoidable circumstances having arisen so as to cancel the contract, plaintiff can claim, under the provisions of the same Article of the Civil Code, compensation for damage caused by cancellation of the contract. Plaintiff's counsel, however, does not take these facts as the cause of the claim referred to. He urges that the defendant company's declaration of their intention to cancel the contract being unlawful, the cancellation is invalid, and that, on the contrary, the defendant company having declared their intention to that effect, rejected the plaintiff's fulfilment of the contract, so that the defendant company's obligation to plaintiff in granting allowance of the net profit realized, turned out impossible. For this reason plaintiff expressly cancelled the contract on his part, and claims compensation for damage caused in consequence. But, as above mentioned, the defendant company's cancellation of the contract being lawful, the contract ceased to be valid, so that it is clear that the contract can not be cancelled by plaintiff. Moreover, if the defendant company's declaration of their intention is the execution of the right of cancellation, there is no reason why the defendant company did not fulfil their obligations. Accordingly the claim of compensation for damage referred to in this action is unreasonable as regards its cause.

(2) On making detailed inquiries whether it is just or not to claim compensation for damage to reputation, it is understood that defendant's counsel admits that the defendant company notified their customers in Japan, as shown in Exhibit No. 13 A, of the defendant company's dismissal of plaintiff. The next thing to be examined is whether the word "dismiss" in Exhibit No. 13 A (or Exhibit No. 9 B) has or has not such derogatory signification as to impair one's reputation. According to the opinion of Mr. D. H. Blake, an expert witness, the word "dismiss" carries a sense that impairs one's capacity and character. This expert witness says that anybody who may receive a notice in which the said word is used to notify that a certain person was removed from service in a certain house, conceives that the said employee was discharged on account of his wrong act, or of his incompetency, or of both of these two. Another expert witness, Captain F. Brinkley, is of opinion that the said word corresponds to the Japanese menshoku, and that if the word is used without any other words that may soften its meaning, the idea that an employee was dismissed on account of some fault on his part, is implied. He further states that if the employee mentioned in Exhibit No. 13 A is a person of high ability, the notice as in Exhibit No. 13 A is understood as treating him with insult. The above two opinions are fully worthy of confidence, and taking consideration of the occupation of plaintiff, such notice as Exhibit No. 13 A may be said to impair plaintiff's reputation. The fact that plaintiff is versed in the business of purchasing and inspecting waste silk, is proved by the contents of the contract of engagement and by those letters (Exhibits Nos. 5 to 12 A) addressed to plaintiff by the registered representative of the defendant company, in which letters plaintiff's distinguished services are commended. It is thus not hard to conjecture plaintiff's social standing. But, on the other hand, it seems that the degree of damage to plaintiff's reputation, which was caused by such notice as Exhibit No. 13 A, was not very great, so that, weighing various attendant circumstances, one thousand (1,000) yen is a reasonable amount to be paid by the defendant company as damages. The rest of the claims put forward by plaintiff are rejected.

Defendant's counsel contends that if the defendant company's action in forwarding such notice as Exhibit No. 13 A had been unlawful, it was only the action of their representative, and that the defendant company, the juridical person, is not responsible for the unlawful action of their representative. But, according to Art. 62 clause 2 of the Commercial Code, it is evident that in case of applying correspondingly Art. 44 Clause 1 of the Civil Code to a Gomei Kaisha, the Company which is a juridical person, ought to compensate for damage which is inflicted upon another, when the representative of that company acts in discharge of his duties. The registered representative of the defendant company in this action forwarded such notice as Exhibit No. 13 A, which action is nothing more than that he (the representative of the defendant company) discharged his duties on behalf of the defendant company. This is proved by the firm's name being signed on the said Exhibit. In these circumstances it is needless to say that the defendant company ought to make good the said damage which was inflicted upon plaintiff. Accordingly the refutation of defendant's counsel on this point is not in the least reasonable.

For the above reasons, Art. 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure is applied as to the costs of the action, and the case has therefore been settled according to the text of the decision set forth above.

The Yokohama Local Court,
Second Civil Department.

Presiding Judge GOTO WASAJI.
Judge YAMAGUCHI ZENROKU.
Judge NOZAWA FUMIHIKO.

Yokohama, June 9th, 1910.

ACTION FOR DIVORCE.

On the 28th ult. the hearing of a case lodged by Captain Mocker, petitioning for a divorce from his wife, Mrs. Laura Maud Owen Mocker, was resumed in the Yokohama Local Court.

Mr. P. J. McCormick, formerly chief engineer belonging to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, appeared in Court as a witness. In reply to the Judge's questions, the witness stated that he became acquainted with Captain Mocker about seven years ago, and since then the witness had been introduced to Captain Mocker's wife by the husband. Two or three years ago Captain Mocker told the witness that Mrs. Mocker had run away with Mr. Carmichael, leaving her child. The witness also heard of this matter from different persons. Some eight or nine months ago the witness was told by Captain Mocker that Mrs. Mocker was in Australia.

Mr. Ideura (plaintiff's counsel) produced an extract of the German Civil Code relating to divorce, and asked the Court to decide in favour of his client, stating that, according to the German Civil Code, divorce can be claimed when either party to the marriage contract ceases to cohabit more than a year with the other. The hearing was then closed. Decision will be given on the 30th instant.

On the 30th instant decision was given in the Yokohama Local Court in the case lodged by Captain Mocker, petitioning for a divorce from his wife, Mrs. Laura Maud Owen Mocker. The verdict was in favour of plaintiff and defendant was ordered to bear the costs of the action.

CLAIM FOR COMPENSATION.

The hearing of a case instituted by the Yokohama Kiito Gomei Kaisha and the Nippon Menka Kaisha against the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, claiming 12,033.55 yen and 7,733.20 yen respectively, for damage to raw cotton, was resumed on the 29th ult. in the Yokohama Local Court.

Mr. F. Owston, of Messrs. Francis Owston and Co., Landing Agents and Customs Brokers, of No. 50-B, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama, appeared in Court as a witness. In reply to the Judge's questions, the witness stated that smoking was strictly forbidden while cargo was being discharged, especially in the case of cotton or silk goods, and that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company particularly observes this rule. At the request of Captain Read, of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, the witness inspected at Kanagawa the lighter No. 14, on board of which the fire had taken place. The lighter was then lying near the beach. He thought that the fire must have been due either to sparks coming from some steam-launches which passed by the lighter, or to friction arising from the chain slings at the time the cargo was discharged. The witness said that as the fire had broken out in the fore part of the lighter and not in the part where the sendo sat, there was no reason to suppose that the accident was caused by smoking.

Mr. Akiyama (defendant's counsel) questioned the witness as to which layer of bales of cotton was supposed to have first caught fire, to which question the witness replied that the middle layer seemed to have been destroyed first.

Mr. Ideura (plaintiff's counsel) asked whether any penalty was inflicted on a man who was caught smoking. The witness said that the only means of punishing him was to suspend him from work temporarily.

Subsequently Mr. Miyake Shigeo, Manager of the Yokohama Yuyiu Menka Soko Kaisha, was called as a witness. He stated that as he dealt in cotton after it had been placed in the godowns, he knew very little about the discharging of it. The receipts for cotton put in godowns were, the witness said, given by his company to the persons who carry the goods from the shore to the godowns.

Mr. Ideura asked the Court to summon as a witness the manager of the Dai Nippon Kyodo Unyo Kabushiki Kaisha, and Mr. Akiyama requested the Judge to inspect personally a lighter similar to lighter No. 14.

The Judge granted the first request, while the second was reserved.

The proceedings were adjourned until September 14.

DINNER AND MUSIC AT THE HOTEL DE PARIS.

The large dining-room of the "Hotel de Paris" was filled to overflowing on the 24th ult. by a representative audience attracted by the good cheer promised them by the chef of this favourite hotel, and by the musical treat afforded by the band of the French Flagship Montcalm now in port.

The Menu provided fully testified to the reputation which this hotel has earned for itself during its long existence here, and the musical programme, which included pieces by Maillard, Wilson, Masseult, Bose and others, was enthusiastically applauded, and reflected the greatest credit on the Chef de Musique and his well-trained corps of 20 musicians. The company, which had an enormous increase after dinner, in the beautifully illuminated gardens, did not disperse till a late hour; the specially fitted-up bar in the gardens being a great attraction for cooling drinks. It is to be hoped that the genial boniface of the Hotel de Paris can see his way for numerous repeat performances during this summer.

YOKOHAMA YACHT CLUB.

The usual races of the above Club were held last Saturday afternoon in fine but cloudy weather. A fresh easterly wind was blowing, the sea being somewhat rough. The race for the 22-raters over the Widow Buoy course brought out Elsa, Edna, Pele, and Sunbeam, and resulted in a win for Pele, Sunbeam being second and Edna third.

There were eight starters in the Lark class. No. 1 proved successful, No. 2 was second and No. 10 third.

Six boats started for the motor boat races, the course being twice round the Tachibana light-ship, Mandarin Bluff, and through the southern harbour entrance, finishing across the starting line. Despite her penalty of 34 minutes, Ellinor won very comfortably from Vectis, No. 4 being third.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EXTORTION BY LOCAL DRUG-STORES.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Quite a number of years ago the foreign commercial communities of Yokohama were thrown into a violent state of excitement by the publication of an advertisement which admonished them to "Ponder and Reflect" on the expenses for their business stationery, the prices for which at that time were already about 50 per cent. lower than they were about 30 years ago, when things were much cheaper than they were at that time.

And they did "Ponder and Reflect." Summer holidays in Miyanoshita, Nikko, etc., trips to Europe for heads of businesses and their families, balls, musical entertainments, etc., of course, came under the heading of necessary expenses, but there must be a serious leak somewhere. And when they had pondered and reflected they came to the conclusion that a perfect Niagara of dollars was pouring out of the cash-box through the alarmingly wide breach of the stationery account. The proprietors of foreign printing offices came to be looked upon with distrust and suspicion, and applications by them for work were almost looked upon as cases calling for police investigation.

Heads of businesses and their managers or head clerks sometimes deliberated for weeks when a couple of thousand letter heads or envelopes were to be printed, and the youngest clerk was sent to every printing office in town for samples and estimates, which were then examined and compared. The job was quite a state affair, and whilst it was being attended to, some of the same firms were robbed of thousands and in some cases of many tens of thousands by their Chinese, Japanese and foreign employés. And somehow the occasional ten cent economies in the stationery bills persistently refused to stop the numerous ten-dollar holes.

It was exasperating. Some uncanny kind of a hoodoo must have been at work, and many of those terribly economical firms have since disappeared from the surface.

And now to the subject of my letter. During all those years the same good people have been paying, without pondering and reflecting, from a couple of hundred to a thousand per cent. "profits" for their drugs and medicines to local foreign drug-stores. There have been complaints to local physicians about extortionate charges for prescriptions, but they could but occasionally transmit a protest, much diminished in force in the transmission; for you cannot get a respectable physician to swear at your druggist for you, and when you went to so-and-so in person you found a misunderstood and much maligned philanthropist, who was sacrificing himself for your sake; in fact, a much injured individual not very far short of a saint, who could show that an article costing 10 cents could not be sold for much less than a dollar without serious loss.

Now, driven by necessity, I have, in the course of years, come to acquire a knowledge of the properties, effects and prices of a good many drugs and medicines, and get many of them in Japanese drug stores, which are satisfied with a very reasonable profit, but they cannot make up, or get made up, prescriptions unless one gives personal explanations; and when medicines are wanted quickly that cannot always be done and it is not everybody who can give the necessary explanations. The prescriptions, therefore, go to the foreign drug-store, and orders for simpler remedies follow them. And that is where the foreign drug pirate scores.

To give a few instances. An excellent remedy to counteract a tendency to boils and to cure boils is 24 grains of sulphide of calcium and half an ounce of sugar of milk mixed. I ordered this from a local drug-store and was charged 50 sen for it. I knew this to be an exorbitant charge and the next half ounce I made up myself at a cost of 4½ (four and one half) sen. On my protest the manager of the drug-store in question was rather embarrassed, but refused to reduce the charge made, with the usual drug-store patter.

I have also shown him that the prices charged for syrup of althea, syrup of ipecacuanha, of a lotion containing chloroform and eucalyptus oil were also exorbitant and nothing less than extortion. In the latter case I got the latest marked prices from the local importers, and thus proved the extortion.

A short time ago I ordered the following tincture, for which the prices of the foreign drug-store in question and those of a Japanese drug-store where I got another dose made are given:—

	Foreign prices. Yen.	Japanese prices. Sen.
2 ounces tincture aromatics50	15
2 " " Valeriana50	18
2 " Hoffmann's drops60	12
	1.60	45

These tinctures and drops are very common and cheap remedies, and assuming that the Japanese drug-store only made a profit of one-third on them, which it does not require a qualified chemist to fill in bottles, the foreign drug-store charged a "profit (!)" of over 400 per cent. (four hundred per cent.) on the transaction of a moment, which is at the rate of 145,600 per cent. p.a.

In the case of the sulphate of calcium powder the "profit" was over 1,100 per cent., or 181,500 per cent. p.a. I do not hesitate, therefore, to call those charges shameless extortion. There is something to "ponder and reflect" upon.

Why, then, it may be asked, does the public not go to Japanese drug-stores for drugs and medicines? The reason is that, owing to the ignorance and carelessness of those in charge of them, there is always the danger of being poisoned. The following instances will show that that danger is a very real one.

1.—In March 1903 the leading Japanese drug-store sent me a pound of cyanide of potash (cyanide) instead of sulphide of potash, to be used in a bath. I discovered the "mistake" in time. If I had not I should not have left that bath alive.

2.—A couple of years later another Japanese drug-store sent me tincture instead of syrup of ipecacuanha. A teaspoonful of the former might have killed the child for whom it was intended. But I knew this and sent the tincture back.

3.—About a week ago another Japanese drug-store sent me tinctura amara instead of tinctura aromatica. I knew that the former contained a dangerous quantity of nuxvomica, a deadly poison, so that the consequences of giving the same quantity as of the latter might have been fatal.

Foreigners in Yokohama, therefore, who have not the necessary knowledge of drugs and medicines, have to choose between being bled to death by foreign druggists and the danger of being poisoned by Japanese druggists, and upon that danger the foreign druggists trade. If there is any article of consumption on which 50 per cent. net profits are made at the turn of the hand I should like to know its name. Why, then, should we pay druggists a couple of hundred or a thousand per cent. profit? Their knowledge is not a sealed mystery, and the articles they sell do not cost their weight in gold or in diamonds. It is simply the ignorance of the public that overrates it, and I have shown that that ignorance is a very costly one.

Thanking you for the courtesy of your columns, and trusting that you may say a word on the subject, I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

"PLAINDEALER."

Yokohama, June 24, 1910.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The letter from "Plaindealer" in yesterday's issue of your paper—presumably an American, judging from his use of the word "drug-store,"—must have been read with feelings of mingled satisfaction by the local culprits whom he takes to task in that unvarnished tale of woe, and it is not unlikely that some amongst them may have felt exceedingly sorry that "Plaindealer" ever discovered the mistake he alludes to in his letter of the Japanese drug-store, which sent him the cyanide of potash instead of sulphide of potash, for if there is anything that this class of philanthropists objects to, it is that the light is being let into their methods of ministering to all the ills that our flesh is heir to.

Still I think that such letters are worse than useless, because they can do more harm than good. If there was the slightest chance of an improvement as the result of such complaints every one would be bound to exert himself in trying to correct the abuses; but the attitude of this gentry is best expressed in the Australian slang, "they've got us by the wool." They know it full well, and they will go on shearing us, however much we may yell out. Every complaint addressed to a chemist about his outrageous charges is met by the usual claptrap about the enormous number of drugs and chemicals they have to keep, deterioration, etc., etc., but at bottom they know very well that we have to come to them all the same, simply for the very reasons enumerated by "Plaindealer."

Seeing, moreover, that the whole world is engaged in doing one another with more or less unblushing effrontery, why not, in American parlance, "let it go at that?"

Yours, etc., "A FELLOW SUFFERER."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—"Plain Dealer's" letter about Druggists is most excellent, by why does he confine himself to one class of extorters only? How about other foreign dispensers of common necessities, who, though their lines of business do not admit of quite the percentage of profit that the Druggist can make, seem to go on the simple principle expressed by the following formula:—laid down cost Yokohama shop + 100 per cent. = selling price? This formula is absolute, no changes in duty, freight charges or variations in the home cost of the article affecting it in the slightest degree.

It makes one tremble to think what the result will be when the new duties go into force next year.

Yours truly, EXTORTER.

Yokohama, June 27th, 1910.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—One of your correspondents in to-day's paper (27th) regards the term "drug-store" as an Americanism. In this he is correct. Whether or not the original complainant in the drug-store affaire is an American the present writer cannot say; but his or her use of the term is still more correct, the English use (chemist) being misleading. Pharmacy and the compounding of drugs is an art attached to chemistry. This latter is not only an art in its practice, but a great science in its theory (or metaphysics).

Berzelius, the two Mayers, Dumas, Berthelot were chemists. Van 't Hoff and Arrhenius, Rensen and Gibbs, Ramsay and Pattison Muir are chemists. I do not think any one will confound them with the compounding of drugs for sale. Professor T. O. Arnold at Sheffield, or Mr. John Stead at Newcastle are applying chemistry to the art of metallurgy of iron. The more chemistry the pharmacist knows, perhaps the better for the public, although strictly his business is only to put up the physician's prescriptions. Both Fresenius and, I think, Rammelsberg, the great mineralogist, began in the drug-store.

In defence of the druggist and his charges it should be said that he is paid not only for material, time, plant, etc., but for his technical skill and time spent in acquiring it. How far the criticism on the Japanese drug-stores is just, would depend much on the form in which an order is given. Cyanide and sulphide are easily confounded to the foreign ear, much closer to us than the Japanese. As poisons are, or should be, clearly indicated by label and by a bottle of peculiar shape and colour, a mistake could be detected. Potassium cyanide and "hypos" (hyposulphite, often carelessly called sulphide) are so much used in photography and other arts that more care than usual should be taken.

With apology for trespassing on your attention, I am, respectfully yours,

J. S. DE BENNEVILLE.

In a little English edition of Shakespeare, I notice that in "Romeo and Juliet" the term apothecary (commonly used in America) is applied.

THE FORMOSAN GOVERNMENT AND THE NIPPON FORMOSA TEA CO.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In view of some grave misconceptions that seem to be gaining ground among a section of foreigners in Japan over the recent action of the Formosan authorities granting a subsidy to the newly formed Nippon Taiwan Cha Kabushiki Kaisha (Japan Formosa Tea Company), may I ask you to insert this communication in your valuable columns? I do so not merely because I happen to possess reliable information about this affair, but chiefly because such misconceptions are, I am afraid, especially mischievous at this juncture when the minds of foreign merchants doing business in Japan seem to have grown highly sensitive in consequence of the heated controversy concerning the revised Tariff.

You must remember that the grant has its genesis in the undertaking started in 1903 at Anping-ching by the Governor-General with the object of encouraging machine-curing in place of the defective and expensive process of hand-curing, which gives only inferior quality, and with the further object of manufacturing black tea. Both the machine-curing and black tea manufacture were an entirely novel business in Formosa, for neither native nor foreign tea dealers in that island, probably deterred by consideration of expense and risk, had ever attempted it. But the successful result realised at the Station in the experimental manufacture of black tea evidently inspired some of the tea-dealers and businessmen in Formosa and Japan with proper courage. At any rate they represented to the Formosan authorities that they would like to undertake the machine-curing and black tea business provided that the Government, in consideration of the difficulty and risk unavoidably attending the initial stage, would extend a suitable aid. Now, in starting the experiments the Government's idea had been from the first to encourage private enterprises conducted in the same line. It had no intention to develop the experiments into permanent undertakings of the Government, already saddled as the latter was with various monopolies. The representation submitted by those interested in the business therefore received the favourable consideration of the Government and the upshot was that it decided to grant the request, and to guarantee an interest of 6 per cent. on the paid capital for a period of five years and to allow gratuitous use of the plant at the Government Station. It was under this assurance from the Government that the Japan Formosa Tea Company came into existence. The subsidy affair is still in the shape of an understanding, the amount to be granted being estimated at about yen 30,000. It will be granted for the special object of extending the sale of black tea in Russia, probably towards the expense of maintaining tea-houses to be established at some principal cities in that country.

Sir, the business pursued by the foreign tea-dealers in Formosa is entirely different from that which the Japan Formosa Tea Company has marked out as its line. They have nothing to do with the manufacture of black tea and its sale in Russia. They are engaged in buying from native producers teas which they suitably mix or refine and then export, so that they may generally be considered as a sort of middlemen. Those foreigners are evidently labouring under a gross misconception, therefore, when they think that the Formosan authorities, in aiding the Tea Company, are making unfair discrimination against them. In my humble opinion there can be no question of discrimination in the Government's attitude toward the Company and the foreigners, since the spheres of activity of the two are entirely different.

Perhaps the remark is more pertinent when applied to the protection which the Department of Agriculture and Commerce used to give till only a few years ago to the Central Tea Association of Japan for extending the sale of green tea in the U.S.A. and Canada, and yet, so far so I am aware, this protection did not occasion any serious trouble beyond raising at times some grumbles or scornful criticism on the part of a section of foreigners. It was never elevated to the dignity and importance of being made a subject of diplomatic or consular protest, as the Formosan Tea Company's affair is threatened to be. The Formosan authorities are especially solicitous for the development of black tea industry in the island, not only because they are anxious to recover by means of the new black tea the ground which the Oolong tea is losing in foreign markets, but there is an equally important question of devising suitable measures of utilizing the reclaimed areas to be wrested from the aborigines. And these hilly districts are judged to be best suited for growing tea shrubs. To question the wisdom of this particular protection of the Formosan Government, would be to raise the whole arguments of political economy for and against State protection. Suffice it to say here that the Government has simply followed its traditional policy in this case.

Thanking you in anticipation for your courtesy of inserting this letter, I remain, etc., Y.T.

THE PROPOSED TUNNEL AT CHUZENJI LAKE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Referring to the article in your to-day's issue about the proposed tunnel from Lake Chuzenji, and to the illustration accompanying this article, I cannot see how this tunnel would be of any benefit to the Ashio mine, for the following reason:—

I, in winter, the Kagon fall is reduced to a mere trickle, it means that the various sources of the lake are decreased in volume to an extent which allows the lake only barely to overflow into the river leading to the fall. If the proposed tunnel is constructed as per the illustration in question, the lake will at once fall to the level of the tunnel and the same "mere trickle of water" will be the result. In other words, unless the sources of the lake water can be increased in winter, it doesn't matter at all where a new outlet is made, or how big it is. Just as soon as the lake reaches the level of this outlet, the strength of the fall will cease.

In fact, this seems to be so entirely self-evident as to make it appear to have been purposely left out of the article to which I have alluded.

Yours truly, "CHUZENJI."

DR. KIKUCHI AND AMERICAN WOMEN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—My attention has been called by a friend to the letters in your issues of June 20th and 22nd regarding what I am reported to have said about American women. I make it a rule to pass over misstatements and mistakes in newspapers regarding my speeches and doings without saying anything about them, for otherwise I should have to do so in almost every case. Such was the case with my speech at the University dinner, which, by the way, was not a public function, in which I am reported to have said that I was surprised at American women being amari otenba, and that as I did not like women being otenba as in America, I did not love them to be injun as in Japan. Now I did not say either that American women were otenba or that Japanese were injun, at all; on the contrary, I bore testimony to the refinement and culture of ladies with whom it was my fortune to be brought in contact during my stay in America. I should indeed deserve all that "Wea" and "American" say or insinuate about me, if I did not feel most grateful for the kindness and hospitality with which I was received everywhere in America and appreciate the good qualities of those ladies in the true sense of the term. Neither should I call Japanese ladies "weak and vacillating"; far be it from me to bring such wholesale charges against those amongst whom are those most dear to me. The aim I had in my mind in this part of my speech, for I spoke about other matters as well, although I am not so reported, will perhaps be clear from the conclusion of my speech, in which I said that although I did not think it a good thing for wives and daughters to be travelling about spending money, while their husbands and fathers were working hard at home, as some American women are doing, neither, on the other hand, did I think it right for Japanese men to leave their wives and daughters at home, while they went about to have a "good time" by themselves, as a great many of them do; and as University men ought to lead in social matters as in intellectual, it would be a good thing if those present were to set an example in Kyoto and institute some kind of social functions in which their families could take part as well as themselves. This, I said, was one of the omiyages that I had brought home from America.

I have trespassed too long upon your space: I do not fear for my American friends who have treated me with such "open hospitality," for they would know me too well. They would also know that newspaper reporters are not infallible, and that newspaper statements, even if left uncontradicted, are not therefore necessarily true; but I should be sorry indeed for such wrong ideas about my impressions of America to go abroad, and I hope you will find a space for this too long letter in your valuable paper. Thanking you beforehand, I am, yours sincerely,

DAIROKU KIKUCHI.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In the Japan Weekly Mail of June 25 I find Dr. Kikuchi, the President of Kyoto University, made the target of rather undeserved strictures by two correspondents, signing themselves "Wea" and "American," who even go so far as to close in the following way: "It ought to be axiomatic, among men of the class to which Dr. Kikuchi is supposed to belong, that public criticism of that class of women puts one out of the rank of real gentlemen," and "That it is axiomatic that such criticism, uttered in public, removes its author from the ranks of gentility."

These are strong words, of which I doubt that many Americans will approve them. Both of your correspondents seem not to know who Dr. Kikuchi really is; that he is a gentleman of the highest order, that he has a very good knowledge and deep insight into Occidental life, that since his time of study in Oxford he is in deep sympathy with Anglo-Saxon ideals, and that he does not fail to give expression to these sympathies, whenever an opportunity arises.

It was just such an opportunity, when the incident happened, which caused the excitement of your correspondents. As I am neither a Japanese nor an Anglo-Saxon and as I have heard the speech of President Kikuchi and understood it, your correspondents will be obliged to consider me as an impartial judge. It was at the occasion of a welcome party given to President Kikuchi after his return from a lecture trip to America, that he delivered an after-dinner speech of about 30 minutes to the faculty of his University. When in the issue of the Japan Mail (June 11th), he is quoted as having uttered in this speech: "That which surprised him most of all was the forward behaviour of American women. . . . That he did not like pert and aggressive women such as America produced," such a quotation, the phraseology of which belongs wholly to the translator for the foreign papers, changes the gist of Kikuchi's speech almost to the contrary. For beginning in a humorous strain, suggested by previous speeches, he soon changed into the tone of earnestness, admonishing the members of his faculty to join him in his endeavour to raise the relatively inferior position Japanese women still occupy now-a-days in their country. It was under the fresh impression of American life and the high position women have attained to in America that these remarks were made, which have been rather harsh for some Japanese ears. He did not deny, of course, that there are extremes visible in the American status of women, which have to be avoided in Japan—and with that your correspondents seem to agree, according to what they say, but what has struck me most in his speech was that he unreservedly expressed his conviction which he had gained in America, that the social position of Japanese women has to be raised and that it is the duty of the University circles to work in this direction.

I hope that my statements will suffice to convince your correspondents that their criticisms were not only out of place but are even harmful to a good cause.

I remain, yours sincerely,

EMIL SCHILLER.

FORMOSA.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The news from Formosa begins to turn interesting reading, especially for one who has seen much of the aborigines during several visits to that island.

After many years of a marvelously successful administration in those parts of Formosa, where the toiling, peaceful Chinaman is settled, and, who, the first time in his experience, has got a real and lasting taste of security of life and property, besides iron roads, high ways, schools, hospitals and other incidents of enlightened colonization, the Authorities have finally come to the conclusion, that some powder and bullets ought to be administered to bring the Formosan savage under "subjugation."

Hitherto, the Japanese had established so-called trading stations on the borders of the savage domains. Here, in these border stations a delightful, practical missionary work, without cant and trumpet, was, if not done, at least attempted. Savages, single or in hordes, coming down from the mountain retreats, were here treated, for days, free, of all charge, with rice, fish sundry palatable delicacies, tobacco, comfortable, clean quarters, medicines administered by up to date physicians, after which pleasant incident in his monotonous life, the savage returned to his haunts, loaded with useful presents. This sort of innocent debauching went on for years. The recipient of these favours, after a day or two, generally repaid his would-be benefactors by stealing down to the plains, covered by the shadows of night, and cut as many heads as he could lay his hands on, without endangering his own precious existence.

Thus, in this particular Formosan business, the Japanese, who are not generally credited with an overdose of sentiment, failed, because of too much sentiment and entirely misplaced humanitarian ideals.

Now, it appears, some powder and lead is going to be applied, in order to bring them into "subjugation." Vain hope, useless and costly experiment! The practical North American soon found out that the only "good" Indian was a dead Indian; and, on that principle, the deadly foes to civilisation and progress were all made "good." Now, the Formosan headhunter can only be made "good," not by being made dead, but "very dead," beyond the possible hope of revival. Giving quarters to, or subjugating a Formosan headhunter is giving quarters to, or domesticating a deadly snake; both will sally forth, in the dark of night, and get rid of their venom, not from malice, but from natural instinct, immutable as the graceful form of the poisonous reptile.

In parts of India, a premium is paid for the head of every poisonous snake brought in. Had the Japan-imitated the Indian authorities, there would, to-day, be less Formosan reptiles, prostituting the human shape, but, there would be vastly more heads on the shoulders of peaceful Chinese breadwinners and useful taxpayers.

Such a truly humanitarian proceeding might, in all probability, have brought forth the shrieks of indignation of some pseudo-humanitarian sentimentalists; and certainly the howlings of some pseudo-missionaries; but then the former discuss, in Boston, over a weak cup of tea or over a glass of well watered milk, art and Christian Science, while the latter vegetate a useless, but peaceful existence in Japan, or live a luxurious life in the palatial mansions of the Korean Empire, their only occupation the prolific breeding of youngsters, who are the terror of steamship travelers, when their elders sally forth homeward to gather more of the visible treasure of the Lord. Neither of these useless drones would even dream to exchange their comfortable quarters with the mountain retreat of Formosa, attempting to do there, what Dr. Livingstone, the scion of all true missionaries, has done in darkest Africa. Thus, as in all probability another Dr. Livingstone will sally forth to Darkest Formosa, there to preach the real and practical Gospel of the Saviour of mankind, the only practical gospel for the Formosan savage fiend is the application of powder and lead, to make him really good. "Subjugation" is not only mesmerizing the poisonous reptile's fangs, but it is a very costly process, and endless into the bargain, for, it is well known, that the reptile glands increase enormously by temporary inactivity and forced rest.

A practical suggestion, as a side issue to the subjugating military work now going on in Formosa, is a reference to a civilizing mission, carried on successfully, for years, in the foremost commonwealth of the South American Continent, in the progressive and highly civilized Argentine Republic.

There, murderers and other criminals, not thoroughly perverted but who have committed crime through provocation, or by a sudden rash impulse, were sent to the border lands of the great Chaco, where they exterminated the South American twin brother of the Formosan savage. Those, who did not fall in this humanitarian work, were rewarded by a grateful, but practical country, with grants of land, where, to-day they are peaceful cultivators of that soil, which was but recently reeking with the blood of the victims by the hands of the terrestrial representatives of the Nether World. "X."

RENAN AS AN HISTORIAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I was somewhat startled when, at the meeting of the Asiatic Society the other day, I heard a gentleman whose intellectual power, keenness and earnest sincerity we all hold in very high respect speak of Renan as a great historian. It set me thinking, and put me on the track of certain treasured memoranda which have some bearing on the matter.

It is to a series of comments on the methods of Renan to which I would direct the attention of readers of the Mail. They are taken from a paper written about thirty years ago by Saintsbury in the Fortnightly Review on "Ernest Renan."

Saintsbury's comment on Renan's Vie de Jésus illustrates quite clearly the vicious methods used by Renan in all his historical writings. He says: "to take a connected narrative and reject such details as happen not to square with preconceived ideas, while admitting the others; to reject a prophecy as obviously false, and take it up the next minute as a trustworthy history of the events à posteriori; to see in a reported miracle, not an imposture but an innocent distortion of ordinary fact—all this seems at first sight to partake decidedly more of the spirit of Dichtung than of Wahrheit."

In the course of his article Saintsbury remarks that Renan's work Les Apôtres has been designated a romance. Renan himself preferred to call it a conjectural restoration of history, and the writer observes that "all conjectural restorations incline to the romantic."

Saintsbury thinks that it is Renan's systematic preference for Dichtung to Wahrheit, or, rather, his substitution of one for the other that lies at the root of his whole method. It is not that he forms a wrong judgment as to what is truth—that question would open the way for endless difficulties—or even that he is careless; it is that he refuses on principle to inquire whether there is any truth at all. When Renan lectures on the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, his special praise of the Imperial Stoic is that "his theology was made up of contradictions, and he never cared to put himself in harmony with himself as to God and the soul."

The habit of thought which finds expression in such views as these cannot be confined to one subject-matter. In fact Renan applies it steadily to history and to philosophy as much as to theology.

In history, no less than in speculation and theology, he dislikes what is peremptory and precise. In all these subjects the notion of attaining abstract truth is held to be a mistake. He held that to grasp at certainties is to sacrifice ideal perfection. He thought that the true gospel blessing is for those who have not believed. Renan believed that there is a sort of vulgarity in pinning one's faith on facts, and that the highest beauty of Christianity is that it is based on human longings, in reality being a mere Aberglaube.

That was Renan to the life—a seer, not an historian.

Yours, etc., CHARLES F. SWEET.

RENAN AND THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Your critical correspondent's "treasure" memoranda of Saintsbury's comment on Renan must afford some merriment to all who appreciate the unconscious humour of naïveté.

It virtually amounts to an admission of belief, on the part of your correspondent, that every story must be either true or absolutely false in all its details. It also involves the assumption, on his part, that "prophecy" can never be traced to events which happened after their reputed anticipation, which is ridiculous and entirely contrary to the results of recent Bible criticism.

"To see in a reported miracle, not an imposture, but an innocent distortion of ordinary fact," is to see what every student of primitive religion, of folk-lore and of human sociology sees. Not to see it is to proclaim a colossal ignorance, a purblind ideation which alone enables your correspondent to find "vicious" methods in a serious attempt to reach the truth.

It is not yet certain that Renan erred in his effort to preserve some historicity behind the Christ legends. Such historicity is becoming yearly less probable. Renan's work was that of a pioneer, and criticism has gone far since then. But it is of little consequence whether there was, or was not, an individuality behind these stories. What is certain is that the evidence of a divine or superhuman activity is of so flimsy and unreliable, not to say factitious, character, that it is utterly incompetent to substantiate the miraculous events upon which Christianity takes its stand.

I am, &c., STUDENT.

The Daily Telegraph's St. Petersburg correspondent reports that the Russo-Japanese treaty will be signed in a few days, thus bringing Russo-Japanese relations into the phase of neighbourliness.

It is believed that the treaty will culminate later in a formal alliance. The treaty deals only with Manchuria, the idea being that peace there will secure peace in the remainder of the Far East. It accepts unreservedly the status quo as the ground-work for future Far Eastern policy.

The correspondent adds that the well-meant but inadequately adjusted action of America and the unfriendliness of China towards Russia have contributed largely to this Russo-Japanese rapprochement.

S. BILL ADAMS.

Some years ago, in an extensive research concerning the Adams family in the Elizabethan and Jacobean periods, says Mr. Withington, in the Guardian, I came across the will of the noted English pioneer in Japan. Not being in the Prerogative Court, with such a common surname, it would be very difficult to find. It is at fo. 21, Register No. 24 (1621-6) of the town section of the Court of the Commissary of the Bishop of London. In the 'D.N.B.' a copy of the will, or perhaps the original, is stated to have been formerly at the East India Office, since lost to view. The full text is as follows:—

In the name of God Amen. The sixteenth of May 1620 I William Adams mariner that haue binn resident in Japon the space of some xvij or twenty yeares beinge sick in body but of a perfect remembrance laude and prayse be vnto Almighty God make and ordeine this my present Testament conteyninge herein my last will in manner and forme followinge that is to say Imprimis I comend my soule vnto Almighty God my Maker and Redeemer trustinge through the meritt of his dearly beloved sonne to inheritt eternall life next I bequeath my body to be buried in the earth from whence it came. Item I will and bequeath vnto my loveinge freind Wm Eaton one of the Englishe Factors resident in Japon for a remembrance of my good will all my bookes and sea Instrumentes that I haue. Item I will and bequeath vnto my servant Anthony five taves in money with all his Liberty. Item I giue and bequeath vnto my maide servant called Jugusa one chody two new Cattaberas that came last from minco and twoe bars of silver of eight taves six mas Item I giue and bequeath vnto John Phebe one barr of silver q^t four taves three mas wthall elce that he is indebted vnto me. Item I giue and bequeath vnto Michael a Coriane tenn tapes wch the sayde Michael oweth vnto me. Item I giue vnto John Osterwick, Richard Kinge, Abraham Smart, and Richard Hudson each of them one Kerrymon of the best I haue. Item I will and ordeine for overseers of this may will and Testament and for the execution of the same my loveinge Freinds Mr. Richard Cock and Wm Eaton I vterly revoke and annul all and euery othr former testaments wills legacies Executors and onseers by me in anywise before this time named willed and bequeathed And soe herevnto I haue sett my hand These whose names are herevnder written beinge witnesses per me Wm Adams. Wm Adams, Richard Cock, William Eaton, Jo: Osterwick Richard Kinge, Abraham Smart his marke, Tho: Bacop.

The following is the translation of the Latin probate act of the will (Commissary of London, town section, Act Book No. 17 [161g], folio 65):—

The day above [8 October, 1621] by Master Edmund Pope, LL.D., Surrogate, was issued commission to Mary Adams, Relict of William Adams, late of Stepney in Country Middlesex, deceased, to administer the goods and according to the tenor of the will of the said deceased by reason of no executor or executors being named in said will [sic]. Inventory; 165*l*. 9*s*. 10*d*.

There are several inaccuracies in the account in the 'D.N.B.' The date of Adams's death is given as the very date of the will. This is unlikely from the character of the document itself. The name of the Cape-merchant is given as Cocks, although twice given in the will as Cock. This may be an error in transcription, the abbreviation sign for the final s or es in old manuscripts and records being the terror of students, and perhaps the champion silliness of all the annoying abbreviation follies of the old scribes. The most interesting point of difference from the 'D.N.B.' account disclosed by the will is that Adams had several children in England, not one daughter only. I hope later on to identify these children and indicate some of the lines of his descendants. The English wife is shown as surviving, but the existence of the Japanese wife is not stated, but left to be inferred.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THROUGH the sudden arrest a short time ago of the President and Vice-President of the United Wireless Company of America, a great sensation has been created in financial circles in New York and elsewhere. The charge filed against them by the prosecuting attorney is that of fraud, involving large sums. It is alleged that the two men in conjunction have made millions of dollars through inflated stock.

THE danger of carrying money in lonely places to pay coolies with has just been again exemplified by a tragic incident in Tonkin. A European named Barnich, accompanied by seven coolies, was on the way to pay labourers, when five of his men suddenly set upon him with knives. After murdering the poor fellow, they rifled the money chest and made off with the cash, about $1,900. None of them had been arrested at the date of last advices.

M. POPTOF, instructor of aviation in the Russian army, was probably fatally injured in an aeroplane accident at Gatchin on the 4th instant. He was manœuvring a Wright machine for the Ministry of War, and he had flown successfully for a quarter of an hour. In descending, however, the aeroplane struck an elevation on the ground and was wrecked. The aviator was thrown out in the crash and suffered broken breast and thigh bones, and severe injuries about the head. Doubt of his recovery is entertained. M. Poptof is the pioneer of aviation in Russia.

THE rice-exporting firms at Saigon are in a bad way, according to the Avenir du Tonkin. All the rice mills are now in the hands of Chinese, who fix their own terms on the European dealers who handle the grain. The other day these firms turned and combined to do away with the established custom under which the lion's share of the rice trade profits went to Chinese millers and brokers. But the Chinese stood firm and insisted on "old custom." The European exporters failed to hold together, and the Chinese again triumphed.

THE Philippines Government is initiating a general movement to stamp out beri-beri, the most destructive of Eastern diseases. According to the Manila Times, the Government will prohibit in all its institutions the use of white or polished rice, a continuous diet of which has been proved conclusively to be the cause of the disease. Until recently beri-beri had baffled the most learned scientists, and a study of the disease for centuries seemed to be but time wasted except that it led to recent discoveries, which have revolutionized the treatment of the disease and hold out hopes of its complete eradication. It was discovered that the disease is caused by eating rice from which the pericarp or outside covering had been removed. The pericarp contains phosphorus, the lack of which in the daily diet causes beri-beri.

THE murder of Lieut. Boyd Alexander at Tama, not a great distance from Lake Chad, which had been mapped by him accurately for the first time, removes at an early age an explorer who had inherited the spirit of the great pioneers, and one who had an exceptionally large share of the explorer's qualities. His way with the natives was marvellous. Mr. Alexander's chief hobby was ornithology, and during several expeditions in various parts of the world he made a notable collection of birds. In 1904 in particular, when he went to Fernando Po and climbed Mount St. Isabel, he brought home many new specimens. But much the most memorable of his expeditions was his journey across Africa, which occupied three years—1904 to 1907. This was the journey when he surveyed Lake Chad, and discovered that it was not so large as had been generally supposed, and was, in fact, composed of two separate lakes. It is greatly to be deplored that this adventurous journey has deprived science of an explorer and naturalist of such great distinction and promise.

WASTED POUNDS ON SKIN ERUPTION

Of Face and Neck—Medicines did
No Good—Suffered for Years and Gave Up Treatment in Despair—
At Last Nose Became a Mass of Pimples and He Hated to Go Out.

NOT A BLEMISH LEFT AFTER USING CUTICURA

"After spending pounds in medicines of various kinds from doctors and chemists for eruptions on face and neck, which I have suffered from for a number of years, without finding the least benefit, I gave it up as a bad job and resolved to spend no more money. I considered it as good as throwing my money away. But gradually it grew worse and my nose became a mass of pimples and assumed a deep purple color. This made me almost frantic and very reluctant to go out of doors. One evening, when reading my paper, I happened to come across an advertisement of Cuticura Ointment. I at once wrote and received a box soon after. It acted like magic, so I resolved to give it a fair trial and can truthfully say that, after using five tablets of Cuticura Soap and five boxes of Cuticura Ointment, I am completely cured—not a blemish to be seen. I have recommended Cuticura to several others who have received similar benefit. I shall now always keep it on hand and shall use no other soap but Cuticura Soap, which will prevent a recurrence. I cannot give sufficient praise to show my real gratitude for the alteration Cuticura has given to me. Edward Whitaker, 21, Westfield Rd., Leeds, England, Sept. 18, 1909."

Cuticura is the most economical treatment for the skin, scalp, hair and hands, of infants, children and adults. A tablet of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment are often sufficient to effect a speedy and permanent cure when all other methods fail.

DEATH.

KERN.—At Zurich (Switzerland) JAKOB KERN, formerly of the firm of SIBER, WOLF & Co., Yokohama. (By cable.)

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

A NAGANO telegram says that Mt. Asama, whose rumblings and eruptions have often been reported of late, is again active.

THE Admiralty has ordered from a firm at Leith an oil engine of 10,000 horse-power. If the engine is successful five others are to be ordered.

A NAGASAKI despatch reports that bubonic plague appears to have been stamped out at Hongkong, not a single new case having been reported last week.

In the course of manoeuvres held on Thursday by the 8th Regiment of the 4th Division, Osaka, the troops were called upon to run at a great speed. The exertion was so severe that many of the soldiers could not keep up with the rest and were left behind on the way. Thirty men fell out and some of them are seriously ill.

COUNT LEO NIKOLAIEVITCH TOLSTOI, the famous Russian novelist and thinker, is again reported to be lying seriously ill. The Count has reached the advanced age of 92.

A PEKING telegram says that the negotiations between the Chinese Ta-tai and the Russian Representative concerning the Sungali navigation question have been postponed until August 1.

MR. INOUE, Head of the Geological Investigation Institution, will leave Tokyo on the 2nd inst. for Sweden to attend the International Geological Conference to be held at Stockholm from the 15th proximo.

THERE are now ten British, five Chinese, five Japanese, three German and two French steamers on the regular run between Shanghai and Hankow, a journey which takes on an average four days up-river and three days down.

A TELEGRAM from Honolulu says that Mr. Aiga, the editor of a Japanese newspaper there, and three other Japanese who have been imprisoned in connection with the recent strike of Japanese labourers in Hawaii, have been acquitted.

THE project of opening a steamship service on Lake Suwa is reported to have matured. A trial run of the two steamers to be used took place on Friday. Starting from Kami-suwa, each of these steamers made a circuit of the lake, stopping at three places on the way.

THE steamer Mexico Maru, built at the Mitsubishi Dockyard, Nagasaki, to the order of the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, was successfully launched on Sunday afternoon. The steamer is one of the six large steamers newly constructed by the Company for its American service. She has a displacement of 6,000 tons, with 15 knots speed.

THE Railway Board has decided to run excursion trains between Tokyo and Kamakura and Enoshima. The programme will be put into operation on and after the 24th instant, every Sunday and Thursday being availed of. Return tickets from Shimbashi 85 sen and from Yokohama 50 sen, including the electric car fare between Kamakura and Fujisawa.

THE Mexican Exhibition will be opened on September 1. The number of Japanese exhibits will be 60 from Tokyo, 40 from Yokohama, 40 from Kyoto, 30 from Osaka, 28 from Kobe, and 28 from Nagoya. Messrs. M. Ota and G. Kato, the commissioners, will leave Yokohama on the 12th instant for Mexico by the steamer Hong-kong Maru.

MR. MIZUNO, Consul-General at New York, reports that since the 28th ult. the Stock Exchange has been much depressed as a result of the railway decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Some of the leading railway stocks have depreciated to the extent of $20, and those stocks which firmly stood the debacle in 1907, are now suffering most. The large banks are endeavouring to revive the market but without success.

ADMIRAL SIR WILLIAM MAY, commanding the First Division of the Home Fleet, is reported in a telegram to the S. C. Morning Post to have sent a message of congratulation to the officers and crew of H.M.S. Temeraire, one of the Dreadnoughts attached to his command, in recognition of a remarkable shooting record that has just been established. Shooting with 12-inch guns, the largest in use in the navy, at a 14-feet target at there thousand yards distance, seven hits were registered out of eight rounds. The time taken was 121 seconds.

DURING the second ten days of last month, the number of passengers carried by the State railways was 3,026,915, with an income of 1,063,884 yen therefrom; and the quantity of freight carried during the period amounted to 642,839 tons, the proceeds of which were 1,097,037 yen, making a grand total of 2,160,921 yen. Comparison with the corresponding period of last year declares in favour of the term this year by 60,984 yen. There was a decrease of 26,717 yen in the Kyushu section only.

THERE was a sensation on the French mail at Hongkong on Monday night, the 20th June, reports the Hongkong Daily Press, when a French prisoner attempted to escape and was shot by one of the guard. The prisoner, who is being taken from Shanghai to France to answer a charge of murder, attempted to jump overboard, but was shot in the chest before he reached the rail. The wounded man was then brought ashore in a launch and taken to the Government Civil Hospital, where he now lies in a critical condition.

THE Yokohama City Office has published the fourth number of the "Summary of the Yokohama City Annual Statistics" in English. The contents of this summary comprise 13 parts, namely, history, meteorology, land and population, education, religion and charities, public health, city administration and finance, commerce, manufactories and industries, banking, communications, police, and lighting and water supply, with tables showing the amount of actual receipts of national direct taxes and municipal taxes, the Yokohama Customs duties collected and other revenue, and the distribution of water by the waterworks.

ACCORDING to the Seoul Press, there is a hot spring at Onchongli in Yongkang district, some 5 miles north of Kwangyang bay, South Pyongan-do. The spring has hitherto been visited mostly by Koreans. Some years ago, when the Japan-Russia war was going on, troops stationed in Chemulpo built a temporary house for the accommodation of sick soldiers. After the conclusion of the war, however, few Japanese went there, except those living near by. It is reported that the authorities of the Korean Finance Department are now making a scientific examination of the spring water with a view to making the place a health resort. The water is said to be similar to that of the hot-springs at Atami, the temperature being very high, while the water contains a great quantity of salt.

MR. AND MRS. A. L. JORDAN, of Nagasaki, celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding on Friday evening last, when they were "At Home" to their many friends. Most of the foreign residents of the port and many Japanese were present. Mr. A. L. F. Jordan, of Yokohama, the eldest son, paid a flying visit to Nagasaki for the occasion, and with the other sons, Messrs. Knud and James Jordan, assisted to receive and entertain the guests. Mr. and Mrs. Jordan have lived in Nagasaki for eighteen years. Mr. Jordan is Superintendent of the Great Northern Telegraph Company. The esteem which they have won for themselves during their long residence, says the Nagasaki Press, was testified on Friday by a large number of gifts, also the receipt of good wishes by telegraph from many former residents of the port.

FORMOSA.

Friday, July 1.

The Mitsui Firm has contributed a sum of 5,000 yen towards a fund to provide comforts for the troops engaged fighting the aborigines in Formosa. It is probable that this munificent step will be followed at a greater or less distance by many others.

Saturday, July 2.

Quiet exists in the Gilan district on the east of the position in Formosa, but it would seem that the flanking movement from Shinchiku in the west was recommenced on the 30th ult.

Our readers will doubtless have understood that the plan of campaign is to attack the Gaogan aborigines simultaneously from the east and from the west, the Japanese base on the west being Yenzan in the Gilan district and their base on the east Rokuchikuzan. Between the latter place and the Gaogan region there are situated a number of aborigines called the Marikoan, and against these the flanking force from Shinchiku commenced its operations on the 30th ult. The trouble with the aborigines is that they know every inch of the ground and are profoundly skilled in concealing themselves behinds rocks and huge trees with which the approach to their villages are thickly overgrown. The consequence is that they manage to shoot at very short range, and, although in many cases their bullets are mere fragments of lead fitted into wooden shells, they do great execution. The chief aim of troops advancing against such enemies must be to utilize superiority of weapons, and thus we find that the Shinchiku force has brought a machine gun into action against the Marikoan aborigines with much effect. One discharge from this gun cut its way right through a village, setting fire to the latter and causing great consternation. The trouble is that a large force cannot manoeuvre in such a country as that inhabited by these aborigines, and a small force encourages resistance. Great reliance is, therefore, placed on the device of building entrenched lines and gradually pushing them forward so as to enclose the savages completely.

Already the length of such lines completed is 307 miles. The entrenchments set out from a place called Nanwo on the east coast at the mouth of the Dakusui River, and after proceeding nearly due west to Yenzan, they turn northward for a short distance, then trend due west as far as Mount Rokushiku, and there are deflected due south to Hori. Within the region thus enclosed, all the Northern aborigines are included. The Southern aborigines have for the most part surrendered and become good citizens, but a heavy job has still to be accomplished in closing in on the Northern savages, of whom the most turbulent are the Taroko on the east coast south of Nanwo and the Gaogan further inland. These two tribes muster about 30,000.

Sunday, July 3.

The news from Formosa this morning is scanty. It merely says that the Shinchiku column moved out again on the 30th ult., partly to effect a diversion in aid of the Gilan operations, and partly to subdue the aborigines in the upper reaches of the Naiwan River. Exactly where this river is situated, the maps do not show, but as the march of the Shin-chiku column has for general direction the Gilan district, we may assume that the river in question has its origin in Mount Yura.

Monday, July 4.

The Gilan force has resumed its forward movement and the Shinchiku troops continue their advance, the objective of both parties being the Gaogan district. It is not probable that we shall hear of any signal results, for striking achievements are evidently impossible in the circumstances. It is rightly remarked by Mr. Egi, Vice-President of the new Colonial Bureau, that fighting in thick forests 3,000 or 4,000 feet above the level of the sea against men who are adepts in the art of concealing themselves, closely resembles the pursuit of wild animals in a South-African jungle. It is thought probable that the arms in the hands of the aborigines came into their possession during the period when the Island was under Chinese sway, and it is evident that they are very scarce of ammunition, for they fire only at close quarters and seldom miss. To take any number of prisoners is impossible. An ordinary soldier, however light his marching order, cannot lay hands on men who wear practically no clothes at all and who traverse the ground with all the rapidity of long acquaintance. Unless an aborigine be completely disabled, he cannot be made prisoner. The only encouraging feature is that although there are 100,000 aborigines, they have no idea of combined resistance. On the contrary, very hostile relations exist between several of the tribes. If they took concerted action and fought on any systematized principle they would be almost invincible.

Tuesday, July 5.

The latest news is that at 5 a.m. on the 2nd inst., the forward movement was resumed by the Gilan forces. These are divided into 5 detachments, and their operations seem to have been successful. An important mountain was crowned and the placing of wire entanglements was commenced at once. There was only one encounter with the aborigines. They opened fire at about 30 metres, but were driven back without difficulty. We do not attach great importance to this news. Hitherto experience has shown that the difficulties encountered by the Japanese troops have been not so much when they were acting on the offensive, as after they have gone into bivouac and commenced works of fortification. They then become liable to sudden and violent attacks from the aborigines, who creep up to short range under the cover of the trees and the underwood. Nevertheless the latest news from Taipeh indicates that quite a serious engagement was then actually in progress between 2 companies of Japanese infantry and a body of some 450 aborigines. The companies were the 5th and the 7th. The latter had moved out to assist the Aiyu advance by a diversion, and this proceeding had attracted the attention of the aborigines, who mustered in considerable strength to oppose the company. The 6th company was then moved out to reinforce the 7th, and the engagement continued until the evening of the 2nd. The Japanese troops had 4 wounded, from which fact we conjecture that the fight took place at long range. Heavy rains are impeding transport operations.

Shimonoseki telegraphs a statement made by an officer who has just returned from Formosa in the S.S. Kasado. He says that steps are now being taken to plant artillery upon the various hills from which the positions occupied by the aborigines will be cannonaded. It will then be inevitable that the aborigines should retreat, and as they will have much difficulty in finding fresh settlements, their surrender on a large scale may be anticipated.

There are indications of a disposition on the part of the aborigines to surrender conditionally upon the withdrawal of the Aiyu line. The Gaogan folks are said to have sent a deputation to the officer in command of the Shinchiku force. The deputies were introduced by the Keito friendlies, and they are said to have urged that if their hunting-ground was entered by the Aiyu, they would have no choice except to resist to the death. If, however, the Aiyu were now withdrawn they would be willing to submit.

There is an indirect indication that the Gaogan aborigines have weakened owing to the heavy losses encountered by them in the recent conflict. That indication is furnished by the conduct of a section of the Keito Aborigines. These men have come into the Japanese lines of their own accord, and have handed over eight rifles, explaining that as they have no intention of offering resistance, neither have they any occasion for these weapons. It is believed that these are the aborigines who behaved with treachery during the recent fighting, and that, observing the weakness of their Gaogan confreres, they have concluded that their wisest course is to surrender.

Wednesday, July 6.

There is nothing specially new this morning. The Gilan force continues its advance, and has pushed into the country beyond Bonbon mountain with only one encounter en route, the result of which was the dispersal of a band of 60 aborigines, the casualties on the Japanese side being 4 wounded. The column moving eastward from Shinchiku has not met with any resistance and is pushing on steadily towards Gaogan. Both columns are said to be adopting every precaution to secure the occupied territory against invasion. Meanwhile the aborigines appear to be endeavouring to make arrangements for concerted resistance. Small parties of them are reported to be moving hastily from place to place evidently with the object of holding councils. Japanese artillery has come into action from one position with markedly successful results.

The news is confirmed that the Gaogan aborigines have sent a delegation offering to submit to the Japanese and to agree to the establishment of the police stations, provided that no further advance is made of the Aiyu lines. They do not object to any measures which the Japanese may deem fit to take against other aborigines, but they declare that if their own hunting grounds be invaded, they will fight to the death. Their proposals are now under consideration. It appears that their losses in the recent encounter were 14 killed and 30 wounded.

The Keito aborigines also are now pleading that their recent act of treachery was entirely owing to a misconception, and they are quite willing to have the police stationed in their district once more. They also pray that a supply of salt and of medicine to cure malaria be sent to them immediately.

Thursday, July 7.

The news from Formosa this morning is that the Gilan corps has had a sharp engagement with the aborigines at the works in the neighbourhood of Bonbon Hill. The Japanese casualties were 7 killed and 8 wounded. This was on the 4th inst. On the following day the losses were 6 killed and 5 wounded. These figures indicate fighting at very close range. It is stated that the aborigines are advancing northward en masse.

THE SPECIE BANK IN MANCHURIA.

Baron Takahashi, President of the Specie Bank, has just returned from a tour in Manchuria. He is quoted as having stated that he had observed with much satisfaction the almost complete disappearance of the adventurers and other objectionable types of Japanese who frequented Manchuria in the days immediately subsequent to the war, and who were very much in evidence when the Baron paid his last visit to Manchuria. But he observed with regret that the greater part of the Japanese engaged in retail business had suffered severely from competition among themselves.

With regard to the Bank's transactions in the nature of loans on the security of fixed property, Baron Takahashi explained that the business was to commence from the 1st of July, and that as the object of the authorities was to extend commerce without favour or affection, accommodation will be given to foreigners and Japanese on equal terms. As to the rate of interest charged by the Bank, it might seem high, but the special circumstances should be taken into consideration. It might be thought that 3 million yen was too small a sum to meet the calls that would be made on the Bank, but Baron Takahashi considered that that amount would suffice for the present at all events, and that if it had to be supplemented, the necessary steps could be taken. There are many products in Manchuria, but the only one worthy of serious attention for export purposes is the bean crop. The Chinese traders are apt to behave in a very dishonest manner with regard to this staple. They contract for supplies at a reasonable rate and then, when the ships arrive to carry away the beans, they demand largely increased prices. Owing to this chicanery a great British firm lost heavily last year, and its agents are now busily buying up beans to prevent any repetition of the disaster. Speaking of Dairen, Baron Takahashi observes that experts are now believed to be unanimous in thinking that the place is not ice-bound in the winter and that, if it suffers from the presence of ice, the fact is to be attributed to floating masses which drift thither from elsewhere. The question resolves itself, therefore, into the possibility of checking this drift-ice. If that can be done Dairen's prosperity will be assured, for although Port Arthur has been thrown open, the restrictions imposed there by naval orders will necessarily prove more or less deterrent. At any rate Port Arthur is not likely to become a place of shipment for anything but coal.

Baron Takahashi, President of the Specie Bank, is again quoted as speaking with regard to the economic and financial condition in Manchuria. He says that hitherto there has been only one bank in the whole district, namely the Chinglung Institution, and that it has been supplemented by a number of usurers. This, however, is not to be wondered at: it is the common experience in semi-developed regions. We gather from the Baron's remarks that it is the intention of the Specie Bank to grant accommodation at first chiefly for the purpose of agriculture, and subsequently to extend its operations to industry. He observes that a majority of the people who have been so fortunate as to make money in Yokohama and Kobe have done so by means of investments in land. But there does not appear to be any opportunity of that kind in Manchuria, inasmuch as Japan's tenure of the leased territory and of the Railway zones is for a limited period only, and such a thing as fee-simple ownership or perpetual lease is not possible. The result is that even in the most prosperous places urban land can be had for about 30 yen a tsubo. In his previous remarks Baron Takahashi was quoted as saying that a great English firm had made a heavy loss last year in beans by trusting the Chinese to adhere to their contracts. He gave the name of the firm, and we of course refrained from reproducing it. But the Baron now denies most emphatically that he said anything of the kind, and evidently the words put into his mouth were a figment of some reporter's imagination.

PORT ARTHUR.

An official explanation with regard to the opening of Port Arthur has been obtained by the Asahi Shimbun. It is prefaced by a statement that the opening of naval ports for commercial purposes is exceedingly rare. Almost the only cases known are Portsmouth and Vladivostok, and very stringent regulations are there enforced as to the employment of pilots and other matters. With regard to Port Arthur, the anchorage has hitherto been divided into three sections. The space on the extreme east of a line drawn straight from the entrance to the northern shore was called the "Eastern Harbour," and was the site of the docks. The space immediately adjacent to the above line and on both sides of it was designated No 2 Harbour; and the space on the extreme west was known as the "Western Harbour." This tripartite division has been modified, the entire space on the west of the above line being thrown open to trade. But in order to reach this Western Harbour, it will be necessary for vessels to pass eastward of the imaginary line, thus trespassing upon the space reserved for naval purposes.

It is for this reason that strict pilotage regulations have been enacted. Of course the Port Admiralty will remain as before and there will be no reduction of its jurisdiction. It is expected that the opening of the Port will have a good effect upon trade, whether in foreign or Japanese hands, and that the defects from which Dairen suffers during the winter season will not exist in the case of Port Arthur.

Mr. Wang, the new Chinese representative at the Court of Japan, who is travelling in Manchuria to acquire an intimate knowledge of local conditions, arrived at Port Arthur on the 2nd inst. and received a most hearty welcome from Governor-General Oshima, with whom his Excellency dined that evening. Mr. Wang was to start for Peking on the following morning.

The first vessel to enter the newly opened Port Arthur was the Portuguese warship Vasco da Gama. She steamed in on the 2nd inst.

It appears to be thought that Port Arthur will act an important part in the over-sea trade of Manchuria. At present the only places from which goods can be exported are Newchwang, Dairen and Antung. Newchwang, however, is completely closed during the winter months and Antung is too much out of the direct route to be really serviceable. Consequently, the bulk of the work is thrown upon Dairen, and the appliances there are not at all adequate to cope with it. The consequence is that from the fall of every year until the following spring, great quantities of goods have to be piled up at Dairen awaiting opportunity for shipment, and much inconvenience is thereby caused. Port Arthur will immediately relieve this tension. It will afford an easy exit for either the coal or the beans of Manchuria, and thus the excessive pressure at Dairen will be eased.

A British Squadron of six ships entered Port Arthur on the 3rd inst., and visits were exchanged between the officer in command and the Japanese Port-Admiral. That evening the latter official entertained a party of English officers on shore. One cannot but reflect on the great changes that have occurred in the Far East since the day in the spring of 1885, when the British Squadron entered Port Hamilton and ran up the Union Jack. Now we have a British Squadron entering Port Arthur and saluting the Japanese Standard. Few events during the Meiji era have caused so much commotion in Japan as did that Port Hamilton incident. It brought the Anglo-Russian rivalry to the very doors of Japan, and seemed to indicate that she would have to make a premature choice between the rivals.

THE PROJECTED BIG SHIPS.

A telegram comes from New York to the effect that the Cunard S.S. Co., not content with already owning the biggest steamer in the world, namely the Mauretania of 40,000 tons, is now about to build a 60,000-ton ship. One marvels where this progress will stop. The writer of this note can well remember the first voyage of the Great Eastern, 47 years ago, when she arrived from America with her passengers' baggage in a state of pulp, and when it was concluded that an 20,000-ton ship must be regarded as an unmanageable monster. Now, however, we hear placid talk of twice 20,000.

A short time ago the Mainichi Dempo reported that the Pacific Mail S.S. Co. had decided to build two monster steamers of from 38,000 to 40,000 tons each, and to place them upon the Far Eastern line. The same journal, having made inquiries in official quarters, now speaks of this programme as a probable canard. It quotes an anonymous informant as saying that the Pacific Mail S.S. Co. does not find its maritime carrying trade sufficiently tempting at present to warrant such a heroic course, more especially as the bill for the subvention of ocean-going steamships has been shelved by Congress. It is probably true that the Canadian S.S. Co., will transfer two of its big vessels from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but it is highly improbable that the Pacific Mail S.S. Co. will make any new departure of the kind attributed to it.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE CONVENTION.

Monday, July 4.

The Asahi Shimbun gives double-headed prominence to a statement that the much-talked-of Russo-Japanese convention has been concluded, and was to be signed on the 4th inst., its promulgation being arranged for the 8th.

Our contemporary devotes a leading article to this subject but does not attempt to throw any light upon the provisions of the alleged new convention. Its remarks are essentially of a general character, but that does not by any means deprive them of interest. The Asahi calls this entente an unnatural agreement dictated by natural causes. It is unnatural from the point of view that the two contracting parties were engaged a few years ago in a life-and-death struggle. It is natural because since then the two erstwhile competitors have learned to like and respect each other and have developed community of interests. The war of 1904-5 was not waged by the desire of the Russian Sovereign. His Majesty is essentially a lover of peace, and the sword would never have been drawn by his deliberate choice. The responsibility rested with the man at the front and with the bureaucrats in office. These unquiet factors have now disappeared, and have been replaced by men who understand that peace is the best policy for the two countries. Thus the rumours that were heard of the renewal of war within the years immediately subsequent to its conclusion, have ceased to be audible. They were greatly quieted by the entente of 1907, which may be said to have owed its existence largely to the previously concluded Anglo-Russian understanding. But neither the Portsmouth treaty of 1905 nor the entente of 1907 covered all the points demanding adjustment. The task of completion remained to be achieved. Hence the new convention, which doubtless will be found fully adequate to the occasion.

Tuesday, July 5.

It is confidently asserted this morning that the text of the new Russo-Japanese Convention was submitted to the Cabinet in Tokyo on the 1st inst., and having been carefully explained by Count Komura, was duly approved. A telegram in that sense was despatched to Baron Motono in St. Petersburg, and it was expected that the Convention would be signed in the Russian capital on the 4th inst.

Meanwhile Tokyo journals contain statements denying that the provisions of the Convention embody any new departure. Its guiding purpose is to secure the policy of the open door and equal opportunity, and it contains nothing whatever of a secret character. All the conjectures and rumours published in the opposite sense are misleading.

Wednesday, July 6.

We sincerely trust that there may be found to be truth in the rumour that the new Russo-Japanese Convention contains a provision for the extradition of political refugees. It has always appeared to us to be one of the least excusable outcomes of historical legislation that men should be protected against the consequences of most hideous crimes merely because their evil deeds bear a political character. Politics ought not to be promoted by assassination or any other form of brutality, nor ought the territories of one country to afford asylum to the dagger-users and bomb-throwers of a neighbouring country. Still there has always been a strong prejudice in favour of the privilege of asylum, and merely to moot the idea of departing from the time-honoured system was to invite opprobrium. The result, is in the cases of Japan and Russia, that men who plot the most inhuman crimes against society find a safe refuge in Nagasaki, while Koreans, who obey their most elementary passions in pursuing political aims, are allowed to convert several Russian towns in Eastern Asia into seed-plots of sedition. If the new convention provides against the continuance of this most uncivilized and immoral system, Russia and Japan will have the honour of substituting, in the conduct of their international relations, reason and humanity for prejudice and brutality.

It seems idle to indulge in any conjectures about the contents of the document, the publication of which is to take place in three days. Nevertheless considerable interest attaches to certain comments attributed by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun to an anonymous diplomat. This expert speaks as though the convention were an affair of prime importance. He recalls the history of the series of conventions which had their prototype in the first Anglo-Japanese entente. That entente, and the alliance which followed it, were obviously animated by the purpose of checking Russia's aggression in Eastern and Central Asia. But a few years later, namely in 1907, Russia and England concluded a convention which practically guaranteed the safety of India by clearly delineating the political spheres of the high-contracting parties in Persia and Afghanistan. Then followed the entente between Japan and Russia, which practically accomplished in Eastern Asia what the Anglo-Russian entente had achieved in Central Asia. In fact the main objects of the Anglo-Japanese alliance were thus accomplished. Now comes the Russo-Japanese Convention, which may be said to furnish a complete answer to the plan recently proposed by America for the neutralization of Manchurian Railways. The aim of the Secretary of State in Washington was to avoid all danger of a collision between Russia and Japan, but that has now been accomplished by the new convention, and thus from every point of view the situation is assured.

Thursday, July 7.

According to the Jiji Shimpō the telegraph is correct in saying that the newly concluded Russo-Japanese Convention has been communicated to the British Government. Indeed that news is superfluous, for we may be very sure that the British Government was kept fully posted by each of the high contracting parties throughout the whole of the proceedings. It is now stated that the Convention will be published simultaneously in St. Petersburg and Tokyo on some day prior to the 15th inst. With regard to the contents of the document our contemporary says that it guarantees the integrity of the Chinese Empire; pledges both sides to respect the terms of their treaties; to preserve the status quo in Manchuria; to maintain the vested interests of the high contracting parties, and to consult together with regard to the course to be adopted in the event of an attempt to impair those interests by any third Power. The document is said to be brief but concise. It does not contain, positive rumours non obstante, any provision with regard to the extradition of political refugees. A special convention dealing with that subject is under negotiation in St. Petersburg.

Meanwhile the press of Paris, while deferring any detailed comment until the publication of the document, is quoted as welcoming the convention most heartily. It describes it as a further link in the strong chain of friendship now existing between England, France, Russia, and Japan, and as materially conducing to Russian interests and influence. The Debats, while greeting the convention heartily, predicts that it will be the immediate prelude of the incorporation of Korea in the Japanese Empire, and the Temps regards the Convention as equivalent to a Russo-Japanese treaty of alliance.

It may be assumed that a considerable section of Japanese political opinion is represented by Mr. Matsuda Masahisa, one of the leaders of the Seiyu-kai. He has been interviewed by the Asahi Shimbun, and he is quoted as saying that the new convention will extend the usefulness and influence of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance and of the Anglo-French, Anglo-Russian and Franco-Russian Treaties. But Mr. Matsuda evidently does not feel altogether confident about the effect that the convention will exercise upon American opinion. He appears to think that the preservation of the vested interests of Russia and Japan in Manchuria is not desirable in American eyes. He has confidence, however, that diplomacy will be able to avert any complication in that quarter.

JAPAN'S OFFICIAL BUILDINGS IN CHINA.

Mr. Shimizu, secretary of the Foreign Office in Tokyo, has just returned from a tour in China and Manchuria, whither he was sent by the Government to inspect the state of the Consular and other official buildings belonging to Japan in those countries. His report, according to the Tokyo press, makes somewhat unpleasant reading. He says that whereas the flags of Western nations float over buildings worthy of the country represented, Japanese officials have to live for the most part in houses hired from the Chinese, and of a most unpretentious character at that. There is a great contrast between the buildings employed as dwellings and offices by officials of the Japanese Central Government, and those similarly used by officials of the Governorship-General in Kwantung or the employees of the South-Manchuria Railway. It is true that in Peking Japan has a fairly good Legation with an official residence for her Representative; but the other members of the Legation staff are obliged to live outside in hired houses. In Shanghai, Hankow, and Kilin, proper buildings are now in process of erection, but no provision has been made for other places of scarcely less importance. We presume that this means a substantial appropriation for building purposes in the next budget. One of Japan's troubles is that Minerva-like she has to spring into the arena fully equipped. In the case of other Powers the growth of their foreign relations has been gradual. Beginning with one or perhaps two consulates, they have extended their sphere of operations through the course of long years. But Japan has not had any such leisure.

CHINA.

Saturday, June 2.

The situation in Peking with regard to the Sungali question appears to be that, in reply to Russia's ultimatum, the Chinese Government asked for a month's delay, and to this Russia has agreed. It will be remembered that St. Petersburg had announced its intention of regarding the River as open to traffic from a certain date in accordance with Russia's rendering of the treaties. The Russian Legation in Peking is quoted as denying that China has agreed to Russia's proposals.

The new Chinese Representative at the Court of Japan arrived at Dairen on the 1st inst. and was to proceed to Port Arthur and Newchwang on the 2nd.

It is reported that large numbers of Chinese from the province of Hupeh are passing through Yingkow en route for the Amur district, where they intend to settle. The distress prevailing in Hupeh is no doubt largely responsible for this movement.

On the 30th ult. at 9 p.m. a party of 11 bandits broke into the store of a Japanese dealer in arms in the old town of Yingkow and carried off three pistols.

The plan recently conceived by the Mukden Viceroy for abolishing all the branch offices of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs throughout Manchuria has had to be abandoned in view of the frequent occurrence of questions involving the functions of these offices.

Sunday, July 3.

The Mainichi Dempo's Peking correspondent wires that the opinion of the leading foreigners in the Chinese capital is hostile to the agitation for the immediate opening of the national assembly. These observers are quoted as pointing out that the idea of granting a constitution to the Empire had its origin in the mind of officialdom and was not in any sense a suggestion from the people. Thus if the latter now venture to dictate the time when the assembly should be opened, they not only show ingratitude but are also behaving inconsistently with the proper order of events. The Prince Regent's rejection of their petition was consequently quite natural.

That is all very true but we have to remember the old proverb that appetite comes with eating. The mere fact of promising a constitution creates a desire for it in the breasts even of men who never entertained any aspirations on the subject.

Shanghai telegraphs a strange price of news. It is to the effect that the German Government has increased its force at Kiaochow by 2,000 infantry and cavalry and 1,600 artillery. Mr. Sun Taochi, Governor of Shantung, is said to have addressed to the Waiwupu a representation on the subject, and the Waiwupu has asked the German Legation for an explanation. We find it difficult to believe that some great exaggeration has not been committed in this case. A force of nearly 3,000 men cannot be spirited secretly over-sea. If Germany had taken such a step something must have been heard of it before now. It is of course possible that a mistaken notion may have been suggested by the arrival of soldiers to relieve the German force already posted in Kiaochow; and it is also possible that in view of the disquieting rumours circulated about China's immediate future, the Berlin Government may have thought it wise to strengthen its Kiaochow garrison. But the most credible explanation of all is that the story is made out of a nearly whole cloth.

It may be mentioned here that the customs revenue collected at Tsingtao during the first half of the current year amounted to 401,983 taels, as against 314,326 taels for the corresponding period of last year. The vessels entering and clearing numbered 147 against a previous record of 107. Kiaochow seems to be fulfilling the predictions uttered originally in connection with the German occupation, for in the face of the above expanding figures, the customs returns at Chefoo are said to be falling off rapidly.

The Japanese Vice-Consul at Canton telegraphs that on the 30th ult., a heavy storm of wind and rain visited the province of Kwangtung, and is thought to have inflicted upon the mulberry plantations injury so great as to materially influence the success of the year's sericulture.

Monday, July 4.

Telegrams from Peking state that the Central Government recently formed a plan for opening a Foreign Affairs Bureau in each of the provinces. The idea was that the heads of these Bureaus should be selected by Viceroys and Governors, and their names should be submitted to the Waiwupu for approval, their management of the duties entrusted to them being thereafter under the control of the Waiwupu. To this project considerable objection is said to have been raised. The provincial authorities contend that it would be an undue centralization of power, and that their privilege of choosing the heads of the Bureau would be a mere formality in view of the subsequent control by the Waiwupu. Further, the names submitted to the Waiwupu are said to have been found very unsatisfactory by that Department, and altogether the programme seems beset with obstacles.

The Viceroy of the Two Kiang gave a grand banquet on the 2nd ult. at Nanking to celebrate the Exhibition. Owing to a wash-out on the railway the arrival of some of the guests was delayed, and consequently the function could not commence until 9 p.m., but this does not appear to have interfered with its brilliancy. Leading merchants, journalists and foreign counsels were numerous represented; Viceroy Chang delivered an animated address, and the proceedings were enlivened by a theatrical performance and by fire-works.

Terrible floods have been experienced in the Changtch district of Hunan. Deluges of rain began to fall on the 14th ult., and water rose to a height said to be unprecedented during the past two cycles. Already the people are suffering cruelly from famine, and now Hunan is added to the list of afflicted provinces. It is to be greatly feared that disturbances will occur in the sequel of these calamities.

News comes from a place which appears to be called Mata-shi, a station on the East-China Railway, to the effect that a body of 100 bandits attempted to extort 300 dollars from a Russian lumber company working in that district. But the marauders reckoned without their host. A party of Russian soldiers, stationed in the neighbourhood by way of precaution, attacked the bandits, and after a short struggle compelled them to fly, leaving six dead and twenty wounded on the field. The Russians had two men slightly wounded. It will be remembered that there has been somewhat vague talk within the past few days of Hungtutz raids against Russian timber yards, and possibly the story may have had its origin in the more detailed account given above.

Tuesday, July 5.

The Prince Regent is said to have decided at the instance of the Mongolian Prince Karachin that the easiest plan to pursue for the protection of Mongolia against aggression is to encourage immigration from China. The Regent has therefore ordered that a sum of half a million taels shall be given by the Treasury to assist emigrants.

It is now confidently asserted that Mr. Straight's expedition to Russia has ended in a complete failure, and that he contemplates proceeding to Japan. But there are no worlds to conquer in this country. Japan has already signified her endorsement of the Chingchou-Aigun scheme, provided that she herself is admitted on ground-floor terms. She is not at all likely to modify that attitude, nor indeed would any action on her part materially change the situation.

Several Japanese railway-experts who have hitherto been employed on the lines in the Yangtsz Valley have just returned from Shanghai to Moji, their services having been dispensed with. They bring news that a similar fate is in store next September for all their compatriots now connected with the Yeh-Han and Szchuan-Han Railways.

Wednesday, July 6.

Advantage has been taken of the presence of a number of Chinese bankers in Nanking to hold a meeting of these experts and form a guild with branches throughout all the provinces. The object of the organization is to facilitate the introduction of the new currency.

The Asahi Shimbun has rather a cryptic telegram from Peking, but we understand it to mean that as two years of his three-year agreement have expired, Sir Walter Hillier has tendered his resignation of the post of Adviser to the Chinese Government, and that the latter is not thinking of appointing a successor. We trust for China's sake that it may prove incorrect. Men of Sir Walter Hillier's calibre are not easily found.

Thursday, July 7.

The Asahi Shimbun's Peking correspondent wires that Chinese politics may be said to be in a state of suspended animation. The question of a national assembly has been shelved for the moment, and the Changsha trouble has resolved itself into a mere matter of indemnity. Meanwhile the unrest in the provinces has more or less subsided, and, as for the problem of the Yangtsz Valley Railways, there is some movement on the foreign side, but none on the Chinese. Moreover, the questions of the Sungali River, of opium suppression, of the Macao boundary and of the Shantung affair are all in abeyance. As for China's domestic politics, the great problems now engrossing her attention are the establishment of bureaus of foreign affairs in the provinces and reform of the currency.

At about half-past 7 o'clock on Monday, says the Kobe Herald, one of the Kobe Electric Light Co.'s poles in Nakayamate-dori, 4-chome, caught fire owing to an imperfect switch. The pole fell towards a house close by, but the flame was extinguished by the people before any damage was done to the house.

KOREA.

Friday, July 1.

Lengthy regulations are published in Seoul with regard to the new police system. It will suffice to say here that the main object of these new regulations is to abolish all the superfluous offices incidental to the dual system and to place the service on a footing of really practical utility.

Saturday 2nd, July.

Seoul is evidently beginning to be a field of agitation. The Ministers of the Cabinet are said to be receiving threatening letters, and a notice has been posted outside the Palace of the ex-Emperor, couched in seditious language and insisting on all persons interested in the welfare of Korea assembling at the place.

The Asahi Shimbun's Seoul correspondent wires that one effect of the transfer of the police authority to the Japanese has been to deprive the Residents of a moiety of their functions. Some redistribution of duties will be necessary.

Tuesday, July 5.

The new Vice-Resident-General of Korea arrived at Chemulpo on the 4th inst. and proceeded in the afternoon to Seoul. He had travelled with several other Japanese officials by a Korean man-of-war. The telegraph states that great precautions were adopted to guard the roads along which the party passed.

There has been another newspaper suspension in Seoul. This time the victim is the Toyo Nippo, and its offence was the publication of forbidden matter.

Times certainly change. It is fresh in the memory of many Far Eastern residents how, only a few years ago, when Kim Okkyun was murdered by a Korean emissary in Shanghai, his body was carried to Korea, and cut into pieces which were exposed at various places. To-day we have an Imperial rescript, issued by the Emperor of Korea, reinstating Kim in his original office and paying a tribute to his memory. The same rescript does similar honour to the following leaders of reform who died for their cause, namely, Mr. Hong Yongsik (President of the Board of Ceremonies), Mr. O Yung-chuang (Minister of Finance) and Mr. Kim Hoingchip (Prime Minister). High posthumous rank is awarded to all these men. Kim Okkyun spent some months in Japan as a fugitive and made many friends among both foreigners and Japanese, the impression he produced upon everyone being that, whatever his methods, his purpose at least was sincere and patriotic. While in this country he was constantly shadowed by assassins sent from his native land, but failing to achieve their purpose in the face of the vigilance of the Japanese police, they finally persuaded him to visit Shanghai, where he was quickly done away with. His death and the honour paid to his assassin, who was carried to Korea in a Chinese warship and granted high office by the Government of his own country, helped not a little to embitter the relations between Japan and China. Reparation now comes, tardily it is true, but none the less welcome.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun has an interesting but evidently inaccurate paragraph professing to embody the chief features of the policy contemplated by the new Resident-General. His Excellency, we read, is persuaded that sufficient attention has not hitherto been paid to the problem of religion. He thinks that this question must be closely associated with successful administration. Proceeding to particulars, he refers to the case of the American missionaries, whose converts are said to number 2 millions. Hitherto the disposition in official quarters has been to regard these Christian converts as enemies, but the new Resident-General thinks that efforts should be made to cultivate their friendship, and that to that end all possible facilities should be afforded for their propaganda. We (Japan Mail) have never heard that any missionary puts the number of Christian converts in Korea at 2 millions. In that statement, at all events, our contemporary's news is exaggerated.

Wednesday, July 6.

The Vice-Resident-General, Mr. Yamagata, seems to have had on his arrival in Seoul a reception which might almost be called brilliant. Prince Wi was among those who assembled at the South Gate to welcome this important official, and it is said that representatives of the various political parties attended with flags. On the 6th inst., Mr. Yamagata was to have his audience with the Emperor, and a banquet was to be given that evening at the Residency-General.

A correspondent writes to inquire whether we were correct in describing as a Korean warship the vessel by which Mr. Yamagata and his suite travelled to Chemulpo. Our correspondent seems to think that Korea possesses no such thing as a warship. But as a matter of fact the Korean Government, some years ago, purchased a steamer from the Mitsui Company and converted her into a cruiser. That is the vessel in question.

The next step contemplated by the Residency-General in Korea is to transfer from the Korean Government to the Residency-General all the hygienic business of the State. This is a natural sequel of a transfer of police authority. Nothing could conduce more to the interest of the Korean people than that Japan should undertake these duties, for if Korea used to be conspicuous for one thing more than another it was the total absence of sanitary precautions. Thus, for example, the only methods practised for combatting an epidemic of small-pox was to hang from the city-wall or from a tree the corpse of a child which had died from the disease. Vaccination was of course unknown until the Japanese introduced it, and there are now between 600 to 700 officially recognized vaccinators at work throughout the country. An interesting obstacle in this case is the fact that owing to the extreme severity of Korean canons of etiquette, a girl more than seven years of age cannot be vaccinated by a male practitioner. Thus the Sanitary Bureau found it necessary to train female vaccinators.

From Haiju in the province of Hwanghai comes news that a body of insurgents are levying black-mail from the inhabitants of that district. They number about forty; wear uniform; carry Mauser rifles, and are under the leadership of a man named Han. The pretext alleged is that money is needed for military purposes.

There has been a very heavy rainfall in the south-west of Korea. The rivers Mankyong and Tangjin have risen more than 10 feet, and the valleys through which they flow are converted into lakes. The telegraph says that about 1,000 houses have been wholly or partially submerged and that there has been a heavy loss of life.

Thursday, July 7.

The Vice-Resident-General paid his formal visit, and presented his credentials, to the Emperor of Korea on the 4th inst., and was entertained subsequently at luncheon by His Majesty.

According to latest statistics compiled by the Department of Finance in Seoul, the whole population of Korea amounts to 12,363,404 and the number of Japanese residents is 143,045, other countries being represented by 11,791. We presume that these figures are at least approximately accurate, and that nothing more will now be heard about Korea having a population of 18 or 20 millions.

The transfer of police authority has now been effected without a hitch. Some difficulties and even some disturbances were anticipated, probably because people remember vividly the commotion caused in connection with the disbanding of the army. But happily these forebodings have proved groundless. The Prime Minister has returned to the capital, and rumour, as might well have been expected, credits him with having attempted to place some obstacles in the path of the transfer, but this forecast also was not verified by events. It may be assumed indeed that the new Resident-General has secured the concurrence of the Korean Cabinet with every step he projects.

According to the latest statistics the number of Yangpan in Korea is 55,563 and the number of Confucian literati is 11,510. It appears to be thought that these two classes of men would have some claim on the State in the event of amalgamation, but we have never been able to discover any valid basis for such a theory. The Yangpan and the literati are simply aspirants to official positions, and even in the event of Korea being incorporated into the Japanese Empire, there is no reason to suppose that administrative posts would be closed to competent natives, any more than they are closed in India; the feudal chiefs in Japan and their vassals were all in receipt of fixed incomes which constituted a charge upon the various fiefs, and consequently the mediatization of the latter required that some special provision should be made for the feudatories and the shuzoku in general. But the case in Korea seems to be quite difficult.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. Wakatsuki, Vice-Minister of Finance is credited with a statement that next year's budget will unquestionably be compiled so as to preserve the policy of the Katsura Cabinet by devoting at least 50 million yen to the redemption of the national debt. Whether it will be possible to apply 70 or 75 millions to that purpose is uncertain. It depends greatly upon circumstances, but there can be no hesitation in saying that every available yen will be devoted to lessening national indebtedness. Next year the third installment of the War Loan matures, and so do the bonds of the Tobacco Monopoly. These together amount to 80 millions, which will be partially met by the 50 millions mentioned above.

As for the 5 or 6 millions accruing from the interest saved by redemption, this money will not be applied to public works but will be employed to supplement the redemption fund.

THE RAILWAY QUESTION IN CHINA.

Peking telegraphs to the Mainichi Dempo that the representatives of the British and German capitalists interested in the Yeh-Han and Chuan-Han Railways are at present in Peking, and will soon be joined by the French and the American representatives. The telegram goes on to say that the advisability of building these lines is fully recognized by the people of Pehchili, Honan, Kiangsi and Shantung, and that they are willing to subscribe liberally. Neither do they object to a foreign loan if it could be taken out of official hands. But they are persuaded that if the loan be negotiated by the Peking Authorities, a large portion of the money will find its way into the pockets of the Chinese negotiators. It is alleged that such was the case with regard to previous loans, and that Mr. Tang Shaoh and Mr. Ling Tang-yuen acquired their fortunes in that way. Therefore the provincials are determined to manage the financing of these lines without official aid. It is further rumoured that the Japanese Government has advised China in a sense hostile to a foreign loan, the reason assigned being that the desire of Europe and America to lend money to China is merely to provide a bases of future diplomatic interference. Yet another and even wilder rumour is to the effect that in concluding a 4 per-cent. loan recently in Europe, Japan's real object was to obtain cheap money for the purpose of engaging largely in Chinese enterprises.

There being no limit to public credulity, it is not impossible that many Chinese will place faith in the above rumours about Japan's action. Indeed it would have been perfectly natural a few years ago that any one animated by friendly feelings towards China should have warned her that Railway loans so freely offered by foreign countries had for their real motive the establishment of spheres of influence. That time, however, may be said to be now past. The loans for the Yangtsz Valley Railways may be truly said to be purely financial transactions, and it is in the last degree improbable that Japan, at this eleventh hour, should have addressed to China a superfluous and belated warning. As for Japan's 4 per-cent loans, all intelligent Chinese must be well aware they were operations of conversion, and that they brought no available stock of money into Japan.

It may here be mentioned that the Peking Daily News has just written a series of articles vehemently attacking the procedure of the group of American capitalists who interested themselves diligently in Chinese investments in the years 1897 and 1898. The Peking paper charges these capitalists with having spent a comparatively small sum on a railway which they sold to China for an amount several times larger, and it goes on to allege that similarly exorbitant methods were pursued by English capitalists in the case of the Shanghai Railway. The figures are given by the telegraph, but they are obviously erroneous. In fact the whole telegram is confused and inconsequential; the only point gathered clearly being that grave accusations have been preferred publicly against American and English capitalists. A curious feature of the incident is that the Peking Daily News has hitherto been considered a strongly pro-American organ.

THE AMERICAN RIOTS.

The latest accounts published in Tokyo say that 19 coloured men and 5 white men lost their lives in the recent riots and that several hundreds were wounded. Strange to say, Washington appears to have been one of the scenes of special riots. Of course there is no occasion to descant upon the horror of this affair. We may be quite sure that it is at least as shocking to the Americans themselves as it is to any of the on-looking nations. America is called upon to solve a problem such as has never fallen to the lot of any other country. She has an immense mixed population, including some types of humanity which, in the lands of their origin, were constant disturbers of peace and order, but which by their absorption into the American nation have imbibed something of the spirit of industry and enterprise that the atmosphere of that great country seems to infuse. Nevertheless these units of the population are still swayed by elementary passions which occasionally are needed to call into violent exercise. Thus the embers of riot are scattered broadcast and may at any moment burst into flame. Above all, there is the negro population. Many negroes make excellent citizens, law-abiding and highly-educated men. But the great bulk of them have nothing in common with white men among whom they live, and they have never been able to divest themselves of influences which impel them to perpetrate crimes specially heinous in the eyes of civilized manhood. It is surprising, not that collisions occasionally occur between this incongruous element of the population and white men, but that collisions are not more frequent. When all is said and done, however, we are driven to the conclusion that where such dangerous elements exist, more than usual care should be taken to avoid all exciting factors. The prize-ring is such a factor. To many of the rougher units of the American population there must be something maddening in the thought that the white men's pugilistic champion should be worsted in a public contest with a black man, especially when the latter is a notoriously depraved specimen of his class. The risk of such a result ought not to be run, and at any rate the prize-ring is a brutal and demoralizing institution. We entirely sympathise with the feeling of shame which must be permeating the American nation in the sequel of the recent riots.

THE BOXING CHAMPIONSHIP.

We trust it may not be thought characteristic of the age that both Reuter's agency and the London correspondent of the Fiji Shimpo devote scores of costly words to sending across the wires a description of the fight between Jeffries and Johnson. Such doings constitute a sorry comment on modern civilization, and the excitement they cause is a strong tribute to the force of elementary passion. The latest appreciation of Mr. Jack Johnson is the following, which we take from the Independent :—

"Jack Johnson, pugilist, who claims to be the world's champion heavy-weight fighter, is a disgrace to the negro people. His profession is a disgrace, and he has been arrested time after time of late for speeding and for assault. We do not like to see negro journals boasting of him as if his brutality were an honour to the race."

THE FOREIGN TRADE OF JAPAN.

The returns of the Foreign trade for the last ten days of June were as follow :—

	Yen.
Exports	11,944,000
Imports	11,443,000
Excess of exports	501,000

The figures for the first half of the year ended June 30th were as follow :—

	Yen.	last year Yen.
Exports	210,829,000	+24,044,000
Imports	239,876,000	+25,438,000
Excess of Imports ...	29,047,000

It is interesting to observe that the trade for the half-year, though larger in dimensions than that for the corresponding period of 1909, resembles the latter closely in one respect, namely, that whereas the excess of imports in 1909 was 28,506,000 yen, the excess this year is 29,047,000. The figures for the last seven years are as follow :—

	Exports.	Imports.	Excess of Imports.
	Yen.	Yen.	Yen.
1910	210,829,000	239,876,000	29,047,000
1909	185,054,000	213,560,000	28,506,000
1908	169,975,000	250,562,000	80,587,000
1907	190,950,000	265,263,000	68,313,000
1906	176,670,000	223,049,000	46,378,000
1905	142,767,000	286,462,000	143,694,000
1904	137,465,000	182,634,000	45,162,000

We may here add that the figures for the Clearing House of Tokyo show a steady but sure return of prosperity. In every month of the year there has been an increase as compared with 1909. The figures are as follow :—

	1910.	Yen.	Compared with last year.
			Yen.
January ...	284,660,498.73		+ 68,192,254.80
February ..	306,630,640.58		+ 73,378,553.27
March ...	349,676,964.07		+ 40,221,389.23
April	350,419,558.42		+ 55,944,312.63
May	329,922,125.58		+ 17,726,955.49
June	334,666,851.65		+ 35,159,566.18
Total ...	1,955,966,639.03		+290,623,031.60

JAPAN'S TRADE WITH RUSSIA.

Figures collected at the Russian Embassy in St. Petersburg with reference to the trade between Japan and Russia are published by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun. They show that the growth of the trade is comparatively insignificant, and while some increase has to be recorded in the commerce with European Russia, the opposite is true of Asiatic Russia. The figures are as follow :—

	ASIATIC RUSSIA.
Year.	From Japan.	To Japan.	Total.
	Yen.	Yen.	Yen.
1906	10,494,000	1,407,000	11,901,000
1907	5,068,000	1,656,000	6,724,000
1908	4,711,000	864,000	5,575,000

	EUROPEAN RUSSIA.
Year.	From Japan.	To Japan.	Totals.
	Yen.	Yen.	Yen.
1906	78,000	41,000	119,000
1907	442,000	174,000	616,000
1908	1,032,000	133,000	1,165,000

It is pointed out that little hope exists of any material expansion of the trade between Japan and Asiatic Russia, for the present at all events. Japanese goods are scarcely in demand at all in the markets of Russia in Asia, and the purchasing power of the latter is very small. On the contrary, the purchasing strength of Russia in Europe is almost unlimited, and Japanese fancy-goods are coming into increasing favour. Thus, although the volume of the trade is paltry at present, its prospects are by no means discouraging.

THE JAPANESE TOURISTS.

Mr. R. Kondo and some of his fellow-tourists have arrived at Nagasaki en route for Tokyo. They are quoted as speaking in enthusiastic terms of the reception given to them in China, and they urge that preparations should at once be commenced for extending a full measure of Japanese hospitality to the Chinese tourists who are talking of visiting this country next spring.

The Japanese business-men are beginning to arrive in Japan, returning from their trip to China. One of their number, Mr. Ohashi, is quoted at some length by the Asahi Shimbun. He thinks that the visit has had an excellent effect in convincing the Chinese that Japan has a sincere desire for their country's material progress. Speaking of the welcome given to them, Mr. Ohashi says that the treatment they received was altogether in excess of their social status. At Mukden a cavalry guard of honour and a band of music were provided by the Viceroy, and at several places the entertainments organized on their account were the work of officials and private persons combined, a most unusual procedure in China. Even the hotels declined to present any bills, saying that the Japanese were the guests of the Viceroy. Mr. Ohashi goes on to praise the tone of the Chinese press, and we may here take the opportunity of mentioning that the exceedingly uncivil comments which the vernacular press in China was said to have uttered at the outset are proved to have been invented by a Chinese merchant in Kobe and busily circulated by him in pursuance of some object which is not explained. As a matter of fact the Chinese press spoke throughout in most friendly strains, and its representatives took an active part in welcoming the tourists.

Mr. Ohashi adds that one thing which had afforded great satisfaction to the tourists was to observe the consideration in which Chinese students educated in Japan are held. Already some of their number are filling important offices, and it was noticeable that more than one address was delivered in the Japanese language by Chinese who, on inquiry, proved to have been educated in Japan. Even at the Nanking Exhibition it was found that among the principal promoters were some graduates of the Commercial High School in Japan.

It has been suggested of late that Japanese influence on China is being gradually supplanted by that of Western States. The tourists contradict this. They found everywhere that community of script and of race constitute a strong link between the neighbouring peoples, and that the Chinese sincerely appreciate Japan's progress. It is essential that the Japanese should reciprocate this sentiment by a courteous and considerate demeanour, and further that they should endeavour as far as possible to join hands with the Chinese for purposes of industrial and commercial development. Mr. R. Kondo impressed this upon his audiences wherever he went throughout China, and his words doubtless had a good effect.

The tourists observed that English influence was as strong as ever in China, and that neither Germany nor America could compare with Great Britain in this respect.

Another fact which obtruded itself upon their attention was that several Japanese words are coming into use in Chinese everyday life. Our readers will doubtless remember that in these columns some comments recently appeared as to the curious action and reaction of linguistic influences in China and Japan. The Chinese language, which is probably the most flexible tongue ever invented by the wit of man, supplied Japan with ample materials for constructing scientific and philosophical terms when she first undertook the study of Western learning. These terms the Chinese themselves are now obliged to take from Japan for use in the same context. But these are not the terms referred to by the tourists. They speak of pure Japanese words pronounced as they are in Japan, namely, such words as toriatsukai, ōgesa and so forth.

THE CHINESE STUDENTS IN TOKYO.

Monday, July 4.

On the 3rd inst. a meeting of Chinese students, held at the Kinkikan in the Kanda district of Tokyo, resulted in a disturbance. The meeting appears to have had its origin in the coming of a certain Mr. Lu, who is visiting Japan for the purpose of sounding the political views of the Chinese students. He enlisted the coöperation of Mr. Chu, a graduate of the Meiji University, and by the latter graduate a notice was issued which resulted in the assembling of some 300 students at the Kinkikan. The meeting was presided over by Mr. Chu, and he proposed at the outset that the question of a national assembly should be debated, and that afterwards the meeting pass on to consider the problem of the Yangtsz-Valley Railways, the appointment of Mr. Wang to represent China at the Japanese Court, and other minor matters. But when the first of these problems was taken up, a majority of the students declared themselves radically opposed to any discussion of such a topic. Their view was that it did not concern them and could not properly be debated. Mr. Chu then passed on to the next topic, namely that of building the Yangtsz-Valley Railways with foreign money. But he again introduced the matter of a national assembly on the plea that it constituted an inevitable corollary of the Railway problem. This announcement threw the meeting into a ferment. It was rightly contended that a majority had already voted against the propriety of discussing the constitutional question, and that to tack it on to the Railway problem was a mere subterfuge. The controversy waxed very hot, and sticks and braziers began to people the air. A strong force of police was quickly upon the scene. They attempted to arrest a student who had wounded one of his comrades, but the interference of the latter prevented the offender's apprehension, and the police ultimately arrested 15 students on a charge of violently obstructing the constables in the discharge of their duty.

Wednesday, July 6.

Since the meeting which ended in a scene of violence at the Kinkikan a few days ago, the Nippon has been ascertaining the opinions of the Chinese students now in Tokyo with regard to the question of an immediate National Assembly. The result is that, according to our contemporary's investigation, a great majority of the students are strenuously opposed to any precipitancy in this case. They argue that delegates from provinces so distant as Yunnan and Szchuan would take more than two months to reach the capital, and that consequently their journey to and from Peking to attend a national assembly would involve no less than 5 months. Evidently therefore what China wants is railways, not national assemblies. Then there are great reforms of finance and administration pressing urgently to be undertaken, and as long as nothing substantial is done in these directions, it is idle to talk of constitutional government. The fact is that certain officials in Peking, for the sake of winning cheap popular favour, are fostering this national-assembly movement, and have sent emissaries to Japan to enlist the assistance of the students.

But though some of the latter have been led astray, the majority of them are too level-headed not to have learned something from Japan's example.

THE NAVAL QUESTION.

This weary problem is again tormenting the minds of Englishmen. The celebrated Captain Mahan has published in the columns of the London Daily Mail an article which, judging from the telegraphic precis, seems to comment very severely upon Great Britain's Naval programme. He says in effect that within a few years German sea-power will be superior to English and that Great Britain has given up the command of the Mediterranean. This has brought out Lord Charles Beresford. His Lordship alleges flatly that the present Government's naval programme is too slow, and that its perfunctoriness has been the means of encouraging German effort. He considers that the two great questions facing England in the future are Socialism and the Navy, and that with regard to the latter the Liberal Cabinet is incurring a grave responsibility. These comments have of course provoked questions in the House of Commons, and have brought Mr. McKenna to his feet with a denial of the statement that by the year 1913 Germany and Austria will have 25 Dreadnoughts against England's 27.

It seems really wonderful that these questions should be wrapped in such perennial obscurity. Anything that anybody says appears to find believers, provided only that it be a sensational statement. Capt. Mahan, however, has never shown himself to be under the influence of emotion and his article in the Daily Mail must have been very interesting.

OPIUM.

The Chinese Government is said to have made no reply yet to the protest entered by the British representative in Peking against the imposition of a heavy tax by the Viceroy of Canton on imported opium. His Excellency Sir John Jordan maintains that this action on the part of the Viceroy contravenes the second, third and fifth articles of the Chefoo convention of 1885, as indeed the Chinese must be well aware. But the Waiwupu keeps silence. We sincerely hope that Chinese officials are not disposed to place Great Britain in an invidious light before their countrymen. England has had everything to lose in the sequel of this anti-opium campaign, and it would be most unjust that a false conception of her attitude should be suggested at the eleventh hour.

RUSSIA AND CHINA.

Negotiations are now going on in Peking with reference to questions of the Sungali River and the imposition of taxes at Harbin. The Mainichi Dempo's Peking correspondent has interviewed a member of the Russian Legation in that city and has learned that China's attitude towards these questions is not as conciliatory as Reuter's telegrams have led the public to suppose. In fact we gather from this official's statement that little or no substantial progress has been made in the negotiations. Some time ago it was stated that the American citizens in Harbin had paid the municipal tax levied by the Russian Authorities, and that this act was interpreted as a concession to purchase Russian complaisance in the matter of the Chinchow-Aigun Railway. We ventured to express scepticism about the truth of this rumour, but we observe that it is now confirmed by the Mainichi Dempo's correspondent on the alleged authority of the above official.

The latest news about the Russo-Chinese negotiations now proceeding in Peking is of an explanatory nature. It says that on the 20th of last month the Chinese plenipotentiaries clearly intimated to their Russian colleagues that it was the wish of their Government to find a friendly solution and, in consideration of that declaration, they asked for a month's delay, which Russia readily granted. This helps to make clear the somewhat cryptic messages sent recently across the wires.

Another message from Peking refers to the outrage recently committed by mounted bandits who set fire to and destroyed a large quantity of timber belonging to the Russian Railway Authorities. The Governors of Kilin and Amur have jointly memorialized the Waiwupu to the effect that on the plea of no adequate protective or punitive measures having been adopted by the Chinese Authorities, a force of Russian troops had been posted to protect the forests where the lumber was cut. The Governors ask that these troops should be removed, but this raises the old question of China's competence to preserve life and property. No one turning over the pages of a Far Eastern journal during the past two or three years and reading the number of outrages perpetrated in that interval by the Hunghutz, can pretend to think that it would be safe to withdraw the Japanese and Russian Railway guards even for a moment. It is decidedly humiliating for China, but after all she has only herself to thank.

THE TOKYO RAILWAY.

There are 110 miles of electric trams actually opened in the city of Tokyo and, according to the Company's charter, 217 miles ought to be opened by the fall of this year. The Company's charter provides that, unless natural calamities or other unavoidable reasons present themselves, the whole system of lines must be completed by December of the 43rd year of Meiji, and that failure to comply with this provision shall invalidate the charter. This question is now said to be under consideration. The Government must feel that its own refusal to allow the Company to charge a reasonable fare is alone responsible for the delay. On the other hand, the Company's legal obligation is explicit. No one predicts what exit will be found from the dilemma.

THE CHINESE MINT.

On the 30th ult. a body of regulations was issued with reference to the new Chinese Mint. It is to have its head-office in Tientsin with branches at Wuchang, Yunnan and Canton. The Central Bank of China (Ta-Tsing Bank) is to be the financial agent of the Mint, and will receive and transmit all coin and bullion coming from the provinces. The regulations say that when the old coins presented for exchange have a fineness of 985, they will be exchanged at once without any discount. The regulations are minute as to cost of transport, ratio of subsidiary coins and such matters, but these things have no special interest for our readers.

Simultaneously with the above, a set of regulations was promulgated with regard to the issue of convertible notes. This is to be done by the Ta-Tsing Bank, and the denomination of the notes will be 1, 5, 10 and 100 yen. It is further provided that the Bank must hold in hand money reserves representing 50 per cent. of its note issues, and that another 50 per cent. must be held in negotiable securities. Further, there is provision that in case of need the Bank may issue notes in excess of its legal limit, but it will have to pay 6 per cent. on such issues. It will be seen that these terms, so far as reserves are concerned, seem scarcely practical. There is the same stringent regulation that generally appears on similar occasions, namely, an order that the convertible notes shall be received in the payment of taxes and in all mercantile transactions, no discount whatever being permitted.

The notes are to be exchangeable for coins at the head office or any of the branches of the Bank of China, the only reservation being that when a large volume of paper is presented for redemption, a reasonable time shall be given for collecting the coin from the mint.

COMMERCIAL AGENTS.

During the last session of the Diet a great deal was heard about the appointment of commercial agents in connection with Japanese consulates in foreign countries, and both Houses passed an appropriation for the creation of this office. The organization of the office has now been announced, and it has been decided that Agents shall be appointed forthwith. They are to have either chokunin or sonin rank, and to be chosen from among consular and diplomatic officials, their salaries varying from yen 1,000 to 3,500 per annum. The first nominee is Mr. Tawara Yutaka, who graduated from the English Law college of the University in 1905, and who has since been in the service of the Mitsubishi Company. It is thought that he will be sent to London. These Agents are to be entirely independent of the consular officials and will have nothing whatever to do with diplomatic duties. Their business will be to investigate the trade conditions closely and to communicate the results of their observations to merchants in Japan, returning to this country from time to time so as to post themselves in the views of their nationals and to keep themselves au courant of conditions existing in Japan.

The results of their investigations will be embodied in the publication called Tsusho Isan, which has hitherto been issued by the Foreign Office six times every month, and which will hereafter be published more frequently and will contain fuller information.

"JAPAN'S EDUCATIONAL NEWS."

Under the above heading the Tokyo correspondent of the Standard sends an interesting letter to that journal, in the course of which he says:—

The arts of sculpture, music, painting, and poetry, which are universally regarded as the highest concrete expression of individualism, remained undeveloped in Old Japan. The principles of life and progress were based upon stereotyped system rather than on reason. There was no complete conception of personality. Ethics consisted in a rough and ready adjustment of rights, which in the end was no more than a mere counterbalancing of relations between individual's families, or clans; but there was no absolute standard of right or any comparison of self with the superior self of a divine ideal.

These views appear to us very inconsistent with the teachings of history. As a matter of fact, sculpture began to be developed in Japan in the 6th century and though its results were, on the whole, inferior to the outcome of Grecian genius, they were superior to the productions of any other country in the same line. As for music, we hold that there Japan has remained in the rear of the West, far in the rear; but that music contributed a full share to the development of individualism in this country as it has done elsewhere seems undeniable when we recall what an important element it was in the nation's daily life from time immemorial. But painting and poetry—how can it be claimed that these arts "remained undeveloped in Old Japan?" It would be difficult to formulate a more incorrect version. For 16 centuries at least Japanese society was a veritable school of poetry. Warriors went down to death with a verselet on their lips. Men made love in couplets. To be able to turn a tanka deftly constituted a title to office, and no aristocratic r  union was complete without a seance of competitive poem-composing. Painting did not form quite such a salient feature of the national life, but it may justly be said to have held a higher position in ancient Japan than in any contemporaneous country, China excepted. The Standard's correspondent seems to have been greatly misled.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL MOVEMENT IN CHINA.

The agitation in favour of opening a national assembly immediately has evidently been quieted for a moment. On the 2nd inst. the provincial delegates who are assembled in Peking held a meeting to discuss their wisest course in the circumstances. Only 30 persons attended, and there were evidences that the spirit of the agitators had been broken. The decision arrived at was that one representative of each province should remain in the capital for the purpose of observing the procedure of the Tszchengyuan, which is to be opened in September, and which will be the forerunner of a national assembly. The rest of the delegates will return to the provinces, there to educate public opinion in favour of their propaganda, and to enlist the sympathy and assistance of Viceroys and Governors. After the meeting of the Tszchengyuan in September, the delegates will again assemble in Peking, and they are said to expect that their third movement will be at once more strenuous and more efficacious than either their first or their second. It has now been made clear that the force behind these agitators is not so great as was originally supposed.

DEATH OF MARQUIS TOKUGAWA.

At 3.30 a.m. on the 3rd inst. Marquis Tokugawa Akitake expired at his residence in Tokyo in his 61st year. Since March he has been suffering from appendicitis, and fatal complications ensued. In 1866, the Marquis paid a visit to Paris and, among his suite, acting in the capacity of secretary and interpreter, was the late Baron Alexander Siebold. The Tokugawa Prince then held the office of Mimbu Tayu (Vice-President of Home Affairs). He was a son of the celebrated Nariaki of Mito, and at the time of his death he held the second grade of the first rank and was a Peer of the Musk Chamber. Those who have lived long enough in the East to recall the events of 1866 will remember vividly what a strong impression was produced in Hongkong by the advent of the Prince and his brilliant entourage. The gentlemen of the cortege wore European habiliments for the most part, but the ladies were all clad in Japanese robes, and the beauty and the brilliancy of their national costume was then appreciated for the first time.

In connection with the demise of this illustrious person, the Fiji Shimpō has interviewed Count Hayashi, who describes a visit paid by him—the Count—to the Empress Eugenie in her English retreat after the death of her son in South Africa. The Count says that the ex-Empress spoke then with much feeling of the friendship that had existed between her son and Prince Akitake on the occasion of the latter's visit to Paris nearly 25 years previously, and Her Majesty entrusted to the Count for transmission to Akitake a cigarette-case which had been the property of her son. Baron Shibusawa also has been interviewed. He describes that he accompanied the Akitake mission in the capacity of treasurer, and he says that the mission had really a political character, its ultimate object being to cement the relations of exceptional friendship shown by the French Government toward the Tokugawa. The Baron alludes to this feature as though it were more or less secret, but we can assure him that it was well understood by the then Governor of Hongkong, Sir Richard McDonnell, who had been duly informed of the facts by the ever-vigilant Sir Harry Parkes. It is matter of history that Sir Harry's keen foresight led him to support the Emperor's cause, whereas the sympathies of the French representative, M. Léon Roches, were enlisted on the side of the Tokugawa.

THE SOY COMPANY.

A general meeting of the Soy Company's shareholders was held in Tokyo on the 30th ult., when it was decided to increase the Board of Directors by two members, and to instruct the new Board to renew negotiations with the creditor banks. In the event of failure, the Company is to go into voluntary liquidation without awaiting the issue of the proceedings in bankruptcy which were recently taken by one of the creditors.

For some months back Mr. Nakano Buyei, President of the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce, has been labouring hard to find a basis of arrangement between the Soy Company and its creditors. Chief among the latter is the Konoike bank to which the Company owes 1,350,000 yen. Its other two creditors are the Hundredth and Tenth Bank (650,000 yen) and the Fujita Bank (330,000 yen). But the Konoike Bank is maintaining a singularly obdurate attitude. It not only declines any of the methods of composition offered, but it also avoids making any statement of the terms which would satisfy it. The directors of the unfortunate Company seem to have behaved in the most straightforward manner. They have one and all pledged themselves in amounts which practically represent their whole fortunes. At present the idea seems to be that the directors should put up one million yen, and to this would be added the sum derived from the insurers of the Amagasaki Factory, together with other assets amounting to one million. Time is needed, however, to collect all these monies, and it is precisely here that difficulty arises, the Konoike Bank apparently being unwilling to give any time. Tokyo newspapers write in a tone of impatience about the Bank's attitude, but we cannot believe that the Konoike directors are acting without the fullest consideration.

"THE EXCURSION JOURNAL."

The latest issue of Messrs. T. Minami and Sons' "Excursion Journal" contains an interesting and valuable essay on the "History of the Japanese Woman." The writer brings to the discussion of his theme a rich store of historical knowledge, and to the many foreigners who imagine that women in Japan have always occupied a very subordinate position and played a most secondary part, the perusal of the essay will be distinctly useful. But we have one suggestion to offer. The writer says:—

Since Izanagi and his wife Izanami, the deities in Japanese myth to whom the foundation of the country is attributed, established the rules for matrimony and general morality by their own examples, the noble humanity elevated through the illustrious virtue of their daughter the Sun Goddess, the Imperial ancestress, has ruled the spirit of the whole nation.

Now would it not have been in much better taste and much more tactful to have left to others the duty of telling about this "noble humanity which has ruled the spirit of the whole nation" for five and twenty centuries? We are reluctantly obliged to confess that a habit of blowing their country's trumpet seems to be gradually coming into vogue among a certain class of Japanese writers. It is not to be denied that they find plenty of precedents abroad, but none the less it is a thousand pities that they should fall into an evil custom entirely foreign to their own ethics and instincts. There is an abundance of expressions in the Japanese language for self-depreciation, but there is an utter absence of the converse phraseology, and it is only when he uses a foreign tongue that the Japanese writer is beginning to offend against this canon of good taste. If he develops it he will be liberally inviting unpopularity.

CRIMINAL APPEAL COURT.

PREVIOUS CONVICTIONS FREELY QUASHED.

The court of Criminal Appeal recently created in England has already amply justified its existence by the number of unlawful convictions it has set aside, sometimes as many as two or three a day. On June 13 the full Court of five judges, presided over by the Lord Chief Justice, quashed three convictions, including the famous Old China case, in which Mr. Arthur Thomas Ellis, of Bond Street, had been sentenced at the Central Criminal Court for alleged false pretences in the selling of certain articles of china to the late Mr. C. J. Dickins. The conviction was set aside on the ground that the trial judge had wrongfully admitted irrelevant testimony calculated to prejudice the jury.

The action of the Appeal Court in this and other cases is nevertheless creating an uneasy feeling in the public mind. While on the one hand some undoubted criminals will by reason of legal technicalities escape with little or no punishment, on the other hand there is too much reason to fear that a larger percentage than anyone likes to contemplate of prisoners now undergoing punishment may have been illegally convicted. The extraordinary Beck case, that miscarriage of justice which had so much to do with the creation of the Appeal Court, made an impression on the public mind that it will take years to remove.

BARON SAKATANI ON THE NAVY.

Speaking at the meeting of the Economic Society on the 2nd inst., Baron Sakatani is reported to have taken a very strong line with regard to naval expansion. He fully granted that all the Powers should devote their best attention to devising some form of tribunal whose judgments would take the place of an appeal to arms, but in the meanwhile every nation must prepare to defend itself, and Japan could not claim any exemption from this obligation. It is of little use to talk of financial conditions in such a context. A country's safety must always rank far higher than its financial condition, and whatever may be the condition of Japan's material resources, her first obligation was to ensure her own safety. Therefore she must build ships, and encourage the progress of industries essential for that purpose. It is not a question merely of building. Celerity in completing the work and competence to provide first-class armaments constitute an inevitable element of the programme, and in all these things Japan must take care not to be left in the rear. In fact, Baron Sakatani lent the weight of his great authority to support the cause of naval increment.

AMERICA AND JAPAN.

It appears that the New York American, which is described as one of the Hirst yellow journals, has just devoted its columns for three days consecutively to the publication of an argument that war cannot possibly be avoided between Japan and the United States, and that the first business of America is to supply herself with a powerful Navy. We have no right, of course, to conclude that such utterances are dictated by anything but patriotic notions. It is quite conceivable that some American citizens may believe in this peril and may deem it a sacred duty to rouse the country to what they regard as the real state of affairs. But there is another hypothesis much more consistent with the methods of yellow journalism. It is that the New York American has published these articles at the bidding of men who would find their account in naval expansion, men, in fact, who look for orders to build ships and cast guns. Our own belief is that the latter theory is the correct one. There is nothing yet discovered which deters the genuine money-grubber.

COMPANY DIVIDENDS.

The Chuo Shimbun writes in rather a pessimistic strain about the prospects of the various companies now occupying the principal place in the Japanese economic world. Our contemporary observes that these companies, with the exception of the Tokyo Railway and the Tokyo and Osaka Exchanges, cannot be said to have accomplished more than the mere payment of dividends equal to those declared by them in the preceding half-year, and that they accomplished that feat mainly by the aid of their reserves. The Chuo regards the outlook for the second half of the year as decidedly disquieting, its argument being that trade conditions show no sign of improvement. Following are the figures showing the dividends paid by the various companies:—

South Manchuria Railway.....	6	6
To-Bu Railway	7	7
Tokyo Railway	66	7
Kei-Hin Railway	6	7

NAVAL INCREMENT.

People are beginning to discredit the talk recently heard with reference to extensive increments of the Navy and Army next fiscal year. It is alleged that the Yamamoto Party and the Yamagata Party brought strong pressure to bear on the Premier with regard to these questions, but Marquis Katsura adhered firmly to his programme, namely, that the state of the national finances must be considered before anything else, and Japan must not acquire for herself the reputation of being a warlike country. The present idea, therefore, is that a few millions added to the ordinary expenditures will represent the whole of the naval increment during next year, the programme being limited to increasing the tonnage of the ships already contemplated. It is alleged that Marquis Saionji pledged himself from the first to support any agreement between the Cabinet and the Yamagata section. Therefore, there is no prospect of a collision between the Seiyu-kai and the Government on this point.

THE JAPANESE AND THE SOUTH POLE.

On the 5th inst. a crowded and enthusiastic meeting was held at the Kinkikan in Tokyo to discuss and to promote the project of a Japanese expedition to the South Pole. The principal persons present were Count Okuma, Mr. Oishi Masami and Prof. Miyake. The idea is that the expedition should start on the 15th October and should proceed from the Bonin Islands via New Zealand, the ship being under the command of Captain Nomura, under whom will serve Lieut. Shirose, the chief promoter of the enterprise. It is expected that the expedition will occupy 3 months, and the public is asked to put up 30,000 yen for expenses. Interesting speeches were delivered by Capt. Nomura and Mr. Shirose, but they dealt chiefly with the details of preparation, and urged that this was no new scheme, since it had been on the tapis since 1892. They said that Japan's honour is concerned in not being left out of such quests. It is said that the meeting was attended by 2,500 youths as well as many officers of the army and navy, and that nothing could exceed the enthusiasm shown.

MANCHURIA.

On the 19th ultimo, three Japanese soldiers got into a dispute with some of their Chinese comrades in the city of Mukden, and a fracas ensued. The affair was trifling in character, but subsequently a number of Chinese soldiers attacked the Japanese and wounded one of them severely. The matter was taken up by the Consul-General Mr. Koike, and the telegraph reports that it has been amicably settled, the Chinese Authorities making due apology. The wounded man is recovering.

To-day a ceremony is to be held in Mukden to signalize the dissolution of the Land Purchase Bureau, which was organized originally in connection with acquisition of land for the purposes of the Mukden-Antung Railway. This means, we presume, that all transactions in the nature of land-purchase have been concluded—a very satisfactory result when we remember how much trouble these transactions were expected to involve.

FINE COURAGE.

We congratulate the Japan Chronicle on having risen to a height of audacity for which even its constant readers did not give it credit. It publishes in parallel columns under the guise of literal quotations, four alleged extracts from the Japan Mail, not one of which, or anything like it, ever appeared in this journal. The great advantage of the Japan Chronicle's device is that it gives access to an inexhaustible armoury of weapons. When a journal descends to the realm of invention for its "facts," it can never be embarrassed by lack of material. Whether it pays, however, to barter the elementary principles of honesty for such wares, many people will be found to doubt.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Friday, July 1.

The revival continued yesterday, and seems to promise to be lasting.

Saturday, July 2.

There is nothing special to remark about the operations on the Exchange on the 2nd instant. The market opened dull, but the afternoon session witnessed a slight recovery owing to the receipt of news that a further reduction had taken place in London's discount rate. It was expected that prices would develop an upward tendency on Monday.

Tuesday, July 5.

News of a slump in American stocks produced a corresponding fall on the Tokyo market on the 4th instant, but some recovery was witnessed on the 5th owing to the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese Convention.

Wednesday, July 6.

Prices entered the upward grade yesterday and in some cases a marked rise was witnessed.

Thursday, July 7.

Yesterday witnessed a heavy slump in all shares, especially those of the Stock Exchange. The depression is believed to be purely artificial, but that it may develop larger dimensions is not denied. We append the quotations for September delivery:—

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

During the course of the present month there is to be held in Brussels a conference of the European Continental Railway Junction Society, and Japan, having been invited to attend, will send three representatives from her Embassy in St. Petersburg. It need scarcely be said that her object in taking this step is to facilitate the linking of her South Manchuria Railway not only with the Russian lines but also with all the routes of Continental Europe. After the conclusion of the Brussels conference, negotiations will be opened in St. Petersburg with that object in view. It would be more correct to say "resumed" than "opened," for negotiations are already in progress in the Russian capital. They will be suspended, however, in order to afford facilities for joining the Brussels conclave. It is stated that the Russian and Japanese Plenipotentiaries now discussing the problem in St. Petersburg, have agreed in every point except the rates to be charged on special goods.

The news is confirmed that the Naval Department has placed with the Mitsubishi Yard in Nagasaki an order for a second-class cruiser, which shall have a displacement of 4,950 tons. The remarkable features of this vessel are that she will have a horse-power of 22,500, and that her boilers will be capable of developing a speed of 26 knots. The Ibuki, a first-class armoured cruiser, which in displacement exceeds this second-class cruiser by 10,000 tons, has only 200 horse-power more.

At the same yard the ocean-going destroyer Yamakaze is in process of construction which will be a sister-ship of the Umikaze now on the stocks at Maizuru. We have already described the Umikaze, and we therefore refrain from further particulars with regard to the Yamakaze.

We read in the Shogyo Shimpō that the amended commercial Code which is to be submitted to the Diet next session will contain punitive clauses for the better control of directors of companies. This may seem a retrogressive step, but it is necessitated by existing conditions. Directors of companies have shown a want of integrity which paralyzes the country's progress, and it is absolutely essential that some restraining legislation should be enacted.

It would not have occurred to many people to think of estimating the progress of foreign language in Japan by investigating the names given to dogs. But that bright idea seems to have suggested itself to the Koishikawa police. In pursuance of their duties with regard to the registration of dogs they recently entered the names of 160 belonging to the inhabitants of that quarter of the city of Tokyo, and they found that every one of the crowd had what the Japanese call a "butter-smelling" name; that is to say, a cognomen evidently of foreign origin. There were no less than 12 "Johnnies" among the pack, as well as several "Jocks." But the old familiar Japanese titles of "Taro," "Jiro" and such like were conspicuous by their absence. A Tokyo journal regards this as a sign of the times. Like the singing and whistling of Occidental tunes which are heard so much in Tokyo now-a-days, the selection of European names for domestic pets is certainly not without significance.

Mr. Kawashima, Chief of the Hokkaido Administration, is exerting himself very vigorously to encourage immigration to that Island. He intends to deliver a lecture at the next meeting of Provincial Governors, explaining the steps that are being taken to develop the resources of the Island, and he will despatch emissaries to the various prefectures for the purpose of encouraging immigration. He says that the number of immigrants has hitherto averaged about 65,000 yearly, whereas in the field of agriculture alone there is ample room for a further influx of at least 3 millions, and as many more in the domain of industry. Our readers are aware that the Diet last year endorsed an extensive scheme for development introduced by Mr. Kawashima and designed to extend over a period of 15 years.

It will be remembered that some time ago a Japanese subject called Terakawa and two of his countrymen were arrested by the Russian police in Northern Manchuria on suspicion of acting as spies. The contention on the side of the incriminated men was that they were simply pursuing their lawful trade as peddlers. They possessed an exceptional knowledge of the Russian language, and although it was ascertained that they were in the legitimate employ of a miscellaneous goods store named Kurosawa, of Yokohama, the Russians found sufficient grounds to apprehend and subject them to close examination. The result is now said to have been that no proof of actual spying could be adduced, and the three men were accordingly acquitted, but forbidden to enter Russian territory again.

Some years ago the Rising Sun Kerosene Co. purchased at Nishihama in the Nodamura suburb of Kobe a tract of land measuring 7,109 tsubo, and erected there a number of store-houses for the purposes of its business. Subsequently Mr. Asano undertook extensive operations of reclamation on the adjacent fore-shore and the consequence was that the action of the sea underwent a change, and no less than 1,700 tsubo of the Rising Sun's land was washed away. It became necessary to remove the storehouses, and accordingly the Rising Sun Co. preferred a claim of 120,970 yen against Mr. Asano. He declined to recognize the obligation, and a law suit has been commenced against him by Mr. Cartwright.

The Nihonbashi Bank is a small concern, being a sort of a child of the Tokai Ginko, but its affairs have of late attracted some attention owing to the singularly unprincipled methods of its directors. They nominally lent a sum of over 20,000 yen without security to a man whose assets were represented by a monthly salary of 12 yen, and they used the money themselves in speculating on the Exchange. They lost the whole amount and they have now supplemented this disaster by showing accounts which indicate a deficit of over 86,000 yen. The total paid-up capital of the Bank being only 75,000 yen, its debts now greatly exceed its assets.

Our readers will be pleased to learn that Mr. Amenomiya's malady shows some sign of amelioration. He was believed to be in a dying condition, and the Emperor conferred on him the 4th class Order of the Rising Sun, in consideration of his eminent services in the cause of commerce.

The same men who caused such a commotion in the affairs of the Tokyo Rice Exchange are now employing precisely the same methods to disturb the business of the Jinju Insurance Co. It is anticipated that official interference will have to be solicited.

The issue of 10 million yen worth of debentures by the Hypothec Bank has proved a great success. The subscriptions have totalled 40,604,500 yen. It will be remembered that the rate of interest is 5 per cent. and the selling price 95. A large over-subscription was always anticipated, but the result has exceeded expectations.

Things are becoming still duller in the money market. Discount rates vary from 1.3 sen to 1.5 sen per diem, and call money is quoted as from 7 rin to 8 rin, while in the vaults of the Bank of Japan there are lying no less than 53 million yen lodged by ordinary banks and paying no interest. In these circumstances it is confidently alleged the banks will have to give up paying any interest whatever on current accounts. They are said to be already making the necessary investigations by way of preliminary to that extreme measure. Less than 3 years ago every depositor in a Japanese bank could get 5 per cent. on his daily balance. Truly the reluctance of the Japanese capitalists to employ their money in industrial enterprises is becoming curious, and constitutes a striking evidence of the shock that has been given to public confidence by the mismanagement of company directors.

The Chiyoda Gas Company has definitely received its charter. The document pledges it to supply gas to all municipal buildings at a rate 20 per cent below its general charge. With regard to its earnings, the provision is that after 5 per cent. has been set aside on account of legal reserve and special reserve, the Company shall be entitled to take everything up to 7 per cent. as dividend, after which it has to give one-sixth of its profits to the Municipality. This, it will be observed, is just one half of the fraction which the City receives from the tram lines, or to speak more correctly, one half of what it would receive if the trams were allowed to charge a reasonable fare. The period of the charter is 40 years, and during that interval the City pledges itself not to undertake any manufacture of gas on its own account. It also reserves to itself the right of redemption in case the Company should dispose of its property.

The holders of the new shares of the Toyo S.S. Company have agreed to pay up a further call of 7½ yen per share. But they complain greatly and not without reason. For whereas the new shares were issued originally as preference stock carrying 12 per cent. dividend, not only are they now without dividend, but also their holders are required to put up an additional sum in order to help the Company out of its difficulties. They have nevertheless waived these points, and agreed to find the money, provided that the new statutes of the Company be strictly observed, namely, that every effort shall be made to reform the administration, and that every question shall be submitted for deliberation by the board of directors instead of being left in the hands of the President. The money resulting from this new call is to be devoted to paying for the new steamer, a sister ship of the Tenyo Maru, which is now being built in the Mitsubishi Dock.

In March of 1909 the Yokohama branch of the Kimmon Bank of San Francisco put up its shutters consequent upon a similar act by the head office on the other side. Ever since then attempts have been in progress to effect a settlement. The principal creditors are Japanese immigrants in the United States, whose hard-earned savings had been entrusted to the Bank for transmission to friends or relatives at home. One hundred and forty five of the Bank's creditors have now applied for a decree in bankruptcy, and have at the same time instituted criminal proceedings against Mr. Shibata, the Principal director. Two charges are preferred against him. One is the forging of official documents, the other defalcation.

It was originally proposed that Japan should participate in the above Exhibition on precisely the terms as other States, and that a space of 150 tsubo should be allotted to her within the general building. But on the occasion of Baron Oura's recent visit to Rome the Exhibition commissioners proposed to him that Japan should have a separate building of her own, the Italian Government putting up a part of the expense. To this proposal the Japanese have agreed, and at the meeting of the Cabinet towards the close of last month it was decided to appropriate a sum of 30,000 yen from the reserves. The proposed building is to cover an area of 250 tsubo, and Mr. Furuichi has been commissioned to draw up the plans, which will be of the Momoyama type.

It is stated that the fraudulent practice of charging habutaye with starch in order to increase the weight has reached to an extraordinary pitch. Originally the manufacturer was content with 5 per cent of starch, but he has now extended the fraud to 25 per cent, and the consequence is that certain over-sea firms have refused to take delivery. The matter is now being vigorously handled by the "guild of dealers" in this fabric, and it is said to have been decided that the authorities shall be approached with a view to undertaking an official inspection.

In their neighbouring villas at Katase Viscount Sone and Mr. Amenomiya are now lying both in a critical condition. Viscount Sone's malady has been definitely pronounced to be cancer of the liver and he is said to be suffering intensely without any means of alleviation or any hope of recovery. Mr. Amenomiya's case also has become very grave. The improvement reported a few days ago proved illusory.

His Imperial Highness Prince Fushimi Hiroyasu arrived in Japan on the morning of the 4th inst., by the S.S. Minnesota. He was accompanied by the Princess who went to Europe to meet him last fall. The Prince has been absent two and a half years, and during that time he is believed to have acquired a thorough military education.

Tokyo newspapers give detailed accounts of the new central station, the building of which has just commenced in Yurakucho. It will be far the most imposing structure in the East, as it will have a front of 1,464 feet and be 3 stories high. It is to be finished in 1913. The frame will be entirely of steel, and the number of pillars erected will be 1,384 with a weight of 3,050 tons. The space occupied by the building will be 2,910 tsubo, and the second and third stories are to be devoted to hotel purposes. There will be rooms for 50 guests and there will be a dining hall 50 tsubo in area.

His Excellency Mr. Katsu Inouye, who has been appointed to represent Japan at the Chilean centenary, is to set out from Shimabashi on the 12th instant, and will embark at Yokohama for Hongkong.

At 10 a.m. on the 5th instant the Ikoma left the Canary Islands for Falmouth, which she is expected to reach on the 12th.

The competition between the Tokyo and Chiyoda Gas Companies has commenced in earnest. The leading journals of Tokyo contain double-headed advertisements announcing that the Chiyoda Company will certainly be in a position to supply gas to the whole city by the month of August 1911, and that the price charged will be 1.80 yen per 1,000 cubic metres, as against 2.40 yen, charged by the Tokyo Gas Co. Installation will be free and the prices of the various articles employed may be paid for by installments spread over a long term of years. It is observed by Tokyo journals that these measures will bring gas within the reach of the poorest classes.

The popular Naval Attaché of the German Embassy, Captain Lange, has been appointed to the command of the battleship Kaiser Barbarossa. While congratulating Captain Lange and the officers and men of the Barbarossa, we can not but commiserate Tokyo on losing such a universal favourite.

TENNIS.

The finals for the Mixed Doubles in the tennis tournament were played off on Saturday at the Bluff Gardens and ended in the victory of Mr. J. M. Mollison and Mrs. H. T. Hume against Mr. E. L. Squire and Miss Tripler, the scores being 1-6 6-3 6-3.

The winners were presented with a shaving outfit and a silver mirror, respectively.

MR. GRIFFITH'S CONCERT.

AN ARTISTIC EVENING.

Mr. Griffith is to be heartily congratulated on the excellent programme which he submitted to the music-loving people of Yokohama on Thursday evening. The items from beginning to end were full of interest, all the artists were in rare form and delighted the audience with a programme which will compare with any given in Yokohama in recent years.

The Brahms trio was interpreted with charm and finish, Madame Führ proving herself an artist of fine temperament, in conjunction with her colleagues, Messrs. Junker and Werkmeister.

Madame Petzold covered herself with glory in her singing and pianoforte work. The dramatic rendering of the Venusberg aria from Tannhauser (Wagner) revealed the artist's exceptional gifts. In the pianoforte numbers Madame Petzold completely captivated her audience. Fine feeling, expression, delicacy of touch, extraordinary technique and intellectual reading of the music were exemplified by this earnest and gifted lady. The applause with which she was greeted was well deserved.

Mr. Werkmeister played the Andante from Dvorak's Concerto with great effect, rendering it without exaggeration, but with an artistic idea of the composer's intentions. Delicacy and finesse were marked features of Mr. Werkmeister's performance.

Mr. Matveieff made his début, and must be complimented on his rendering of the Prologue from Faglicci. Mr. Matveieff possesses a fine voice which we hope to hear in Yokohama again.

Of Professor Junker one cannot but speak in terms of praise, and with high appreciation of his finished and refined playing. Mr. Junker is always a sound artist, and a great pleasure to hear. The ensemble between the piano and violin was very fine, especially in the suite from Schuett.

Mr. Griffith had the happy association of Madame Petzold in his flute solos. Mr. Griffith was in excellent form and fully maintained his high reputation as a master of his instrument. His artistry was evident in every selection he gave. At the conclusion of the concert the ladies were the recipients of beautiful floral tributes.

THE FOURTH OF JULY.

On Monday the American Independence Day was celebrated in the usual manner. An interesting programme of yacht races was carried out in the afternoon. Of the larger yachts, Mary starting at 2 p.m. covered the set course of 12 1/2 miles by 4 5/12", with Naniwa half an hour behind, and Asagao 43 minutes.

Of the 22-raters, seven of which sailed the course, Pele finished first at 3 42'35", Edna crossing the line 45 seconds later, followed by Maud (3.46'02") and Valkyrien (3.47'58"). Pele, however, was awarded the prize on handicap.

Nine Larks started at 2.30 over the appointed six-mile course—Nos. 1, 2, 5, 7, 8, 10, 12, 15, and 16. After some capital manoeuvring, No. 7, sailed by Mr. N. Brockhurst, came in first, and No. 1, sailed by Messrs. Shields and Allbright, second.

A dinner party was given by the U.S. Consul-General at the Grand Hotel. Ambassador O'Brien and a large number of Japanese and American officers and officials were present.

The display of fireworks given off the Bund was favoured with almost ideal conditions, and was witnessed by the usual enormous concourse of people, both ashore and afloat. There was perhaps a little more wind than was good for the set pieces, but the night was suitably dark and the sky-rockets, in particular, showed to the best advantage. The display began at nine o'clock, ending shortly after ten, and deserves to rank among the most successful in recent years.

ST. JOSEPH'S COLLEGE.

The teachers and pupils of St. Joseph's College held their Ninth Annual Commencement Exercises yesterday afternoon at the Van Schaick Hall, 178, Bluff, before a large attendance of friends. The audience consisted principally of ladies, but there was a fair sprinkling of gentlemen, foreign and Japanese.

YACHTING.

Some good racing was witnessed on Saturday in almost ideal weather, with a very good turn-out of the "fleet."

Four 39-raters sailed over the Kawasaki Course—Mary, Ronin, Naniwa and Asagao,—the first-named, as usual, winning easily, Ronin, second, Naniwa, third.

Ten 22-raters (two new boats, Maud and Wee McGregor, swelling the number) sailed round the Widow Buoy course, Pele finishing first, Valkyrien second and Edna third.

Eight larks raced for a prize cup, No. 7 coming in first, No. 1 second, and No. 12 third.

HISTORY'S HABIT.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 7)

HISTORY'S habit of self-repetition is always interesting however familiar. In the supplement to the Ninth Edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica the following passage occurs with regard to the days when Treaty Revision was a burning question:—

Whereas the case for the foreign resident stood solid and rational so long as it rested on the basis of his proper attachment to the laws and the judiciary which the efforts of his countrymen through long generations had rendered worthy of trust and reverence; and on the equally intelligible and reasonable ground that he wanted convincing proofs of Japan's competence to discharge her novel functions with discretion and impartiality before submitting himself to her jurisdiction; it ceased to be a solid and rational case when its champions undertook, not merely to exaggerate the risks of trusting Japan implicitly, but also to demonstrate her radical unworthiness of any trust whatever, and to depict her under aspects so deterrent that submission to her jurisdiction assumed the aspect of a catastrophe.

We have a precisely parallel situation today, mutatis mutandis, with regard to the new Tariff. The attitude of the foreign merchant in Japan has been quiet, dignified and courteous. He has employed the orthodox channels for conveying his views to the officials concerned. Those views were naturally opposed to any marked increase of the Customs' duties; for although the money will come out of the Japanese consumers' pocket ultimately, an influence more or less crippling may be exercised upon the trade. We can be sure, therefore, that the arguments against increase were forcibly marshalled by the Foreign Board of Trade, however moderate the language employed. But as to the exact contents of the Board's representation, silence has been carefully guarded. There has not been any manner of appeal to popular prejudice. As business men the foreign resident merchants have treated the matter on a purely business basis. We are not cognisant that so much as one letter has been addressed to the local press on the subject. What, however, has been the attitude of that press? Its first appeal has been to sentiment. Japan has been told that she owed it to her ally to grant special concessions to the latter, and that, by failing to do so, she has shown herself ungrateful and disloyal. Sentiment and emotion have no proper place in the sphere of business; they are wholly incongruous. Moreover such a claim invites easy refutation. The Japanese need only point to the British Colonies, where is seen the spectacle of Britain's own sons treating their parent as an utter stranger. The ties of blood, it will be admitted, should be at least as binding as the bonds of policy. The foreign local merchant has appreciated this fully. He has carefully eschewed every appeal to sentiment or emotion. Not so his self-constituted champions. Another feature of local journalism has been to vilify every channel through which Japan's plea has been ventilated. We are not speaking of espousing Japan's cause or of endorsing the new schedule of rates. Only a commercial expert could do that conscientiously, and the publicists who gave to the world the outlines of Japan's side, have not been commercial experts nor have they ever pretended to be experts. They have merely acted as channels of communication and have frankly described themselves as such. Yet by the foreign local press they have been denounced in terms of unmeasured opprobrium; and held up as persons deserving of general execration. One would suppose that the Japanese views did not deserve consideration at all; that even to consider them was a species of crime, and that the good old rule of audi alteram partem should be ignored in this case. Extravagance of that kind is unfortunately familiar. To protest against it is quite useless, as experience has fully shown. Our object in writing is simply to invite our Japanese readers to avoid the error of identifying the foreign merchant with the parody of him painted by his self-appointed local journalistic champions. He is not that kind of hysterical, unjust and truculent person at all. His attitude throughout the whole of this Tariff controversy has been cool and reasonable.

THE JAPANESE HOUSE OF PEERS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 8.)

THE Japan Times has an interesting article the gist of which is that the House of Peers must reconcile itself to become one of two things, either an assemblage of party politicians or a congeries of personal factions. In the old days when the House consisted mainly of men who, whether they sat by right of heredity or by the call of their Orders, represented the cream of the nation's intellect, there was no practical objection to an attitude of aloofness from party ties and to the support of a bureaucracy headed by the makers of the Meiji Era. But the makers of the Meiji Era have passed away for the most part, and so have their illustrious supporters in the Upper Chamber. Henceforth the councils of State will be directed by lesser magnates and the personality of the latter will command, and will deserve to command, less reverence in the Upper Chamber, where also individual ambitions will assert themselves with ever-growing force. Therefore the Peers had better step down from their pedestal and frankly enter the arena of party politics. That seems to be the trend of our contemporary's argument. But if we have stated it correctly, it appears to be underlaid by an erroneous assumption that men have degenerated in Japan, and that it is no longer possible for the aristocracy to be guided by an ideal. Twenty years have come and gone since the Peers were first required to elect representatives of their Orders for an Upper Chamber. Is any one prepared to allege that during those two decades the general level of education and intelligence has not been greatly raised among the Peers of Japan? Is anyone prepared to affirm, or will anyone be disposed to believe, that the nobles who sit in the Upper House to-day are ethically or intellectually inferior to the nobles who sat there in 1891? Nothing seems to indicate that the Japanese Peers of the 20th century are incapable of obeying the lofty motives that swayed their predecessors of the 19th, or that the morality of the former is less steadfast than the morality of the latter. And what are we to say of the statesmen of our own time? Have they, too, degenerated, and are they less worthy of support than were the Genro? Not by any means. It has always been the world's habit to laud the past; to forget its disfigurements and remember only its comeliness. But very little reflection is needed to discover that the Japanese edifice of the Meiji era has needed for its completion just as great hands as were required for its foundation. In the pages of every country's history there are names whose brilliancy seems to throw all their context into shadow. But the general level of human intelligence tends steadily upwards. And what, after all, has been the basic attitude of the Upper Chamber in Japan? It has been to support, not a bureaucracy, but a principle—the principle that the Crown is the one and only source of constitutional privileges, and that everything not explicitly granted by the Crown must be held to have been reserved. Ministries have not been placed by the Japanese Sovereign in a position of responsibility to the Diet. They have been made responsible to the Throne. That is the principle which the House of Peers has uniformly supported. If the members now abandon their steadily maintained attitude and group themselves along party lines, one section must throw in its lot with the advocates of Cabinet responsibility to the Lower Chamber. We do not look to see the Peers take any such step, even though the time were ripe for it. They will await some explicit expression of his Majesty's will.

REMINISCENCES OF AN ARTISTIC LIFE.

AN APPRECIATION OF MADAME PETZOLD.

Edvard Grieg, the great Norwegian composer wrote, "The great artistic abilities of Madame Schjeldrup are so well known and appreciated that there is nothing left to be said; the talent she possesses is priceless." Massenet says, of the same lady,—"I have the greatest admiration for Madame Schjeldrup's magnificent talent." And so on—the gifts of this remarkable lady call for no suggestion of doubt. It is difficult to criticise a personality of such striking evidence. Both in singing, pianoforte playing and clear intellectual talent and rare artistry, it would be hard indeed to find her equal. At the Griffith concert on Thursday last this admirable artist demonstrated her exceptional gifts. One might fittingly apply the word genius to such a personality. As a tribute let one of her hearers say that Japan is indeed fortunate in being able to utilize this lady's fine abilities at the Uyeno School of Music, where her devotion to art must already be felt by the students from all parts of the country. The Tokyo School of Music is in safe hands with Madame Schjeldrup-Petzold, Professor Junker and their colleagues. While much could easily be written of this remarkable artist, let it be sufficient to say that Madame Petzold is no disgrace to the illustrious Liszt, her master.

THE BOOKSHLF.

The "Kokka."

No. 240 of the Kokka has 7 pictures 1 in colours and 6 in black on white. They are up to the standard of the celebrated magazine, which is high praise. A portrait of Susano quelling the demons, by Hokusai, illustrates all the mannerisms of the renowned artist, and recalls the days, four decades ago, when Hokusai's works were a drug in the market. He was discovered by foreign connoisseurs, and but for their consideration he would still be "unwept, unhonoured and unsung." The letter-press of this number consists virtually of two essays, one by Mr. S. Taki on "Exhibitions and Japanese Art; the other by Mr. S. Sawamura on "The Dawn of Modernism in Japanese Art." Mr. Taki admits that exhibitions have exerted a salutary influence on Japanese art by tending to give to its productions a public character. Japanese pictures are essentially domestic in range of effect. Small in scale and simple in colouring, they are lost in a spacious gallery. This, however, is not universally true. Mr. Taki points out that the paintings current in the period from Suiko to Nara were chiefly of a public nature, having been intended for display in massive temples amid impressive surroundings. This is notably true of the Ema-dō pictures, that is to say, the votive paintings found in the Ema-dō of a temple or a shrine. The efforts of modern Japanese "reformers" to impart to their work features of an exhibitional character have not always resulted very happily, but that the goal will be reached by and by can not be doubted.

Mr. Sawamura's essay on the "Dawn of Modernism in Japanese Art" is only introductory. It is devoted to determining what constitutes "modernism" and the circumstances which led to its rise. The essay promises to have very interesting developments.

A Corner of Spain, by WALTER WOOD, Illustrated in colour and line from pictures by FRANK H. MASON, R.B.A. London, George Bell and Sons.

THE public is already familiar with Messrs. Black's series of "beautiful books" illustrated in colour and dealing with regions noted for their scenic interest. While some of the reproductions from paintings which form the principal feature of these books are very effective, it must be confessed that the colours in many of them are too pronounced, not to say startling. It not infrequently happens, too, that the letterpress which accompanies them is neither frankly descriptive nor informing. Volumes of this kind usually begin with a professed abhorrence for the guide-book, and in order to avoid the slightest resemblance to that product of enormity, end by being neither fish, fowl nor good red herring. We have in mind, in particular, a "beautiful book" on South Devon, which, were it not for several charming pictures, would sorely try the patience of the most enthusiastic nature lover. But, we hasten to say, this does not apply to "A Corner of Spain." Not only is the letterpress of a higher order, and with more "body" in it, than the average "beautiful book," but the illustrator is wiser far, for he has not merely relied on the "oilette," but has enlisted the aid of the humble camera and of the even humbler pen. The result is a volume which deserves in a special degree the description of a beautiful book—and one, we may add, well worth reading, apart from its pictures.

In Lotus-land Japan, by HERBERT G. PONTING, F.R.G.S., with illustrations from photographs by the Author. London, Macmillan & Co.

THIS is another order of the book beautiful, and, we may add, on a larger and more lavish scale. Mr. Ponting's photographic studies are already well-known in this country, and when we say that the present volume contains a hundred such illustrations, attractively "written round" (we quote from Mr. Ponting's modest preface), the resident in this Far-eastern "lotus-land" knows what to expect. Mr. Ponting does not pretend to possess any profound knowledge of this country—thus, in the chapter "Concerning Japanese Women," he disclaims (while recounting their charms) any experience of Japanese home-life; but he has brought to his task, as regards the people, an open mind, and, as regards the country, a keen sense of the beauties of nature, aided by what may fairly be described as a genius for photography. The result is a book which no person interested in this country can afford to be without. With one premise from the foreword, however, we are inclined to join issue: it is that "the beaten tracks, including as they do the most famous points of interest, are naturally the best tracks." We fancy that those who know the country best would hesitate before endorsing that dictum. There are places of beauty and interest in Japan that the average tourist and the average resident know not of—places which will stand comparison with any of "the most famous points of interest"—just because they are off the beaten tracks. Thus, we do not find any descriptive reference, in all Mr. Ponting's 400 pages, to Japan's finest district, from the scenic point of view—the Hida-Etchu mountains and their magnificent valleys; nor to the delightful region about Kago-shima Bay. Notwithstanding these omissions, however, the book is a feast of interest. Variety is given by the inclusion of chapters on the Artist-craftsmen of Kyoto, the Flower Festivals of Tokyo, and the Old Swordsmiths of Kamakura, not to mention the temples of Nikko, Nara and Kyoto. Fuji, of course, occupies a chapter to itself, with some of the choicest photographs, nor are the Ainu of the far Hokkaido forgotten. Altogether Mr. Ponting's "labour of love" forms a charming addition to the ever-growing mass of literature devoted to the description of this favoured land.

The Undesirable Governess, by F. MARION CRAWFORD. London: Macmillan and Co.

LADY JANE is blessed with an inconveniently amatory husband—a retired Colonel—and several grown up sons equally endowed with an appreciative sense of feminine charms. Consequently the question of a governess for the tuition of the two unruly daughters with which Fate has also blessed her becomes a problem of some difficulty; and when the portrait of one charming governess is found in the Colonel's waistcoat pocket, the problem becomes acute. Hence the advertisement for a lady tutor absolutely devoid of personal charms, and warranted to repel rather than attract. How Miss Leslie fulfils these invidious conditions and the surprising developments which followed on her appointment, may be left to the reader. The story, if somewhat slight, is told with all Mr. Crawford's grace of style and skill in characterization.

Corporal Sam and other Stories. By "Q" (A. T. QUILLER-COUCH). London: George Bell & Sons.

ALL that Mr. Quiller-Couch writes has a distinction of its own, but there is in this volume of short stories both good work and indifferent. The subjects are interesting enough, but their handling is not in every case above criticism. The story which gives its title to the book is a grim episode from the Peninsula war. A young corporal is so sickened by the horrors of the storming of San Sebastian that his reason becomes unhinged and he takes upon himself a homicidal vengeance for an atrocity committed by the English Rifles. On the other hand, the tales of the Great Civil War are excellent. "Red Velvet" is most effective, and "The Copernican Convoy" has something of the swing of "Q's" earlier romances. In the other tales Mr. Quiller-Couch draws upon his familiar Troy Town stock—narratives both grave and gay.

Bedford Town and Bedford Schools, the "Times" Publishing Co., Bedford, England. Copies can be obtained on application to Mr. G. C. Walker, 1, St. Paul's Square, Bedford.

THIS is an interesting little book, very tastefully illustrated, about the town and schools of Bedford. To the majority of people living abroad or in the colonies, Bedford is only known as the place where John Bunyan wrote his famous book, "The Pilgrim's Progress," and for its proximity to Elstow, the little village where he was born. But during the last 40 years it has been making itself celebrated for its schools. The founder, Sir William Harper, a native of Bedford, who afterwards became Lord Mayor of London, endowed the schools with some property near London, in 1542, which then brought in 55 pounds a year, but unexpectedly increased in value to an enormous extent, so that the gross revenue in 1907 amounted to £17,000, when there were 157 teachers and 3,164 pupils in the various schools. The Bedford Schools are a happy combination of boarding-school and day-school, which seems to have proved a great success. A large proportion of the day-pupils are the sons and daughters of retired officers of the army, and Anglo-Indians, who have settled in the town in order to reap the advantages of the schools. Bedford is on the river Ouse, and the scenery along its banks is most picturesque. The "school song" shows that an admirable esprit de corps prevails:—

"O North, and South and East and West
Wherever you roam o'er the earth's wide breast, You'll find the boys of the Eagle crest
From Bedford by the river."

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

St. Petersburg, June 18.

To-day the Third Duma of His Majesty Nicholas the Second practically concludes its Third Session; and will not reassemble for legislative work until the Autumn. The end of the Session, as not infrequently occurs in older Parliaments than Russia's novel institution, has been marked by the passing with feverish haste of Bills that are of the highest consequence. Such Bills in older Parliaments would be taken early in the Session and subjected to minute examination and the fullest discussion. But in the case of Russia's Parliament it must always be borne in mind that the initiative in all really important legislation is outside the Duma, that the Bills on important matters of State have been carefully drafted, thoroughly discussed, and finally settled by the old machinery of Department Commissions on which no member of the Duma has any place. When the real Government of Russia, the Ministers responsible only to the Sovereign, have with their several departmental staffs elaborated a new measure or modified an existing law, it is submitted in a finished form to the Duma, which refers it at once to a Committee of the Duma. The members of Committee pretty thoroughly examine the new measure, and Departmental officials, occasionally even Ministers in person, attend to offer explanations to the Committee on points which may be raised. So far as the outside world can judge, the general effect of this work seems to suggest rather the picture of a number of earnest inquirers after truth being sedulously coached by complacent officials: one is not greatly impressed as yet with the importance of the work done by Duma Committees in matters of serious legislation. They are certainly studying and assimilating, under the guidance of a Government independent of and above them, the complicated science of statecraft, but they are still unmistakably in statu puillari. The Duma Committees, however, nowadays work together with Government officials without any of the friction once so painfully noticeable, and in so far the Duma has educated the chinovnik. As already stated in these letters this was precisely what the Octobrist Party set out to accomplish in the Third Duma. Whereas the other great constitutional party, the Constitutional Democrats ("Cadet,") endeavoured in the First and Second Dumas to rouse the nation at large to a sense of the needs of Russia and the potentialities of the situation created by the ill success of the war in the Far East and the revolutionary violence that followed it—a principle of action that is unfairly described by the real rulers of Russia as technically high treason—the Octobrist Party in the Third Duma have appealed almost solely to the governing classes, endeavouring at all costs to drive home the lesson to minds but little anxious to learn it, that a Duma is not a new government for Russia but only a novel weapon to be wielded by the hand of Russia's statesmen to do the work that they have hitherto accomplished by wielding other weapons. There can be no question of the wisdom of this policy, planned and carried out so successfully by the able leader of the Octobrists, M. Alexander Guchkov, now President of the Duma. The older institutions of Russia, the vast machinery of the autocratic Bureaucracy, have found that jealousy of the new institution, the Duma, is somewhat absurd, that their fears for their continued existence were unnecessarily exaggerated, that they can still govern Russia with the Duma; it is merely the donning of a new uniform practising a new drill with a new weapon—in all essentials the fighter and the objective aimed at remain the same. In fact it is becoming recognised pretty generally that the word "Duma" ("thinking-place") was a misnomer, for the Russian Duma has in practice turned out to be every bit as much of a "Parliament" ("talking-place") as the most rabid "constitutionalist" could desire. It no longer exhibits that nugatory tendency towards minute subdivision which developed fifteen distinct "parties," "groups" and "sections" out of five in a couple of years. The sudden shock of M. Khomiakov's resignation of the post of President which he filled so admirably sufficed, as it was intended, to check this fatal subdivision. But in other respects the Duma cannot be said to have improved under the new President. It has continued to exist: it has thoroughly disarmed the jealousy of the ruling caste: it has established itself as an essential part of the machinery of State. Could more than this be fairly expected in three Sessions from a novel institution suddenly sprung upon a country governed like Russia for ages past by the strong hand backing the individual will? History will recognise the value of the work so humbly and so patiently accomplished by the Octobrist Party, by M. Alexander Guchkov, in so brief a period. But the nation at large is hardly satisfied. One has not to go very far away from St. Petersburg to hear that Russia is worse off than ever: that the Duma is doing nothing, that it is merely the lickspittle of Ministers, that the tyranny exercised in old days by the provincial Jupiter was modified by personal idiosyncrasies which could be successfully appealed to in various ways largely mitigating his irresponsible rule, whereas now-a-days the local Juniter is every whit as irresponsible and no less strict, but with the fear of interpellations in the Duma ever before his eyes is adamant to those influences that formerly mitigated the severity of his rule, and to every other form of appeal has the ready and unanswerable reply that 'you have the Duma now; make new laws and I shall be happy to carry them out.' The Duma has been engaged for three years now in making its foothold good. It has still two years to run. In these two years it may still accomplish much to satisfy the real desires of the country. It may show fight to the Government of Russia and bring about an earlier dissolution: it may continue to study the science of statecraft at the feet of Russia's statesmen and, from the point of view of provincial malcontents, 'do nothing.' Whatever the line taken by the Third Duma, it has behind it now not only the monarch who called the Duma into being, but also the better part of his age-old Bureaucracy, the real rulers of Russia ever since the days of Peter the Great. That record alone would suffice to give the Third Duma an honourable line in the world's History. Circumstances may not impossibly show up, before History comes to be written, how far the Duma has assisted the Government in that first essential for all great States—the power of attack and defence. In the earnest endeavour to provide Russia with an adequately equipped fighting force the Third Duma has never faltered, and of this all-important work in the State too little notice has been taken, for it is, from its very nature, necessarily carried on in secret conclave. In the domain of defence and of finance the Third Duma may be boldly credited with positive results of no mean magnitude, but its greatest work is in having made good the foothold of the new institution for all time.

OUR BERLIN LETTER.

(FROM OUR BERLIN CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin, June 20.

Moltke, the nephew of the Empire-maker, and Arnim of Criewen ("Tristram of Blent" if English readers would like a parallel) follow Dernburg into the wilderness. For my own part I can never see why there should be so much fuss about a change of members of a cabinet in Germany. Exactly three years ago, to be precise, on Sunday morning June 23 1907, the official press announced that Count Posadowsky had received his political coup de grace and that Studt, that pear so ripe for the falling, had also not survived a ministerial revirement. I propose to quote the most intelligent of the comments published on that occasion. It ran as follows: "In a country where parliamentary government prevailed nothing would be more natural than that a new policy should demand new men. Prince von Bülow has devised a new policy and a new programme which will attempt at any rate to take account of the new conditions brought about by the combination of radical and conservative bourgeoisie against the forces of ecclesiastical reaction on the one hand and those of ill-balanced and disorderly progress on the other. Count Posadowsky and Studt make way for men chosen by the Chancellor expressly to assist him in his new policy." Three years have passed. The combination of the radicals and conservatives against etc. etc. has gone to pieces. For a year the new Chancellor has struggled on with the old programme and the old cabinet. But one by one the timbers of Bülow's ship have refused to bear weight and finally the last vestige of the programme, the reform of the Prussian electoral law, has gone by the board. With the policy goes the cabinet. The Government (not Hollweg not another but the indefinite "Government") is face to face with a new situation. Hegemony, I had almost written TURANNIS, is emphatically in the hands of the men whom Dernburg, Moltke and Arnim were put in to oppose (to wit the 'forces of ecclesiastical reaction'): that old Junker camarilla which was to be softened into a politically digestible party-caucus by the democratising effect of governmental liberalism, reigns just as surely as it did when "Philli" made magic circles round the Imperial Personage, Prussia and the Rueful Knight of Hohen Finow bowed down in meek admission of the dominion.

To come to personalities: Arnim of Criewen, a brave fellow from Criewen, followed the amazing "Pod," to wit Tippelskirch Podbielski, who died politically in September 1906 of the south west African scandals. Arnim, with his venerable beard, quiet eyes and affection for cabbages, was the last man who should have been drawn into the whirlpool of German party politics. As it was he suffered much from gout or gallstones and left the greater part of his work to the Geheimraths ("Chorus of ignorant, indolent Geheimraths" who for all the abuse heaped on them get through the work of the country whilst their elders and betters are suffering from political or physical gallstones and who are therefore to be compared to the civil servants that run old England what time party-leaders hold futile confabulations at the club!). "Faith" said Arnim of Criewen, when one asked him whether he would return to politics, "I have no enthusiasm for politics and for a time, quite a long time, I would do very well without them. I am minded to return to Criewen and plant my cabbages!" Something of Medina Sidonia in this Arnim, of him who was sent to smash Drake and before he came at him wished himself at home again "amongst his orange-trees!" So farewell Arnim.

Frederick von Moltke. How often at some great function in the rooms still haunted by Bismarck's ghost one saw the bald head over in the corner near the window with a circle of strictly official friends round him. Good and friendly "Raths" from the lower floor of the Foreign Office would personally conduct strangers round the crowded room (via the buffet) and arriving not quite within hearing distance would whisper "That is Moltke."

They would never add anything else. Ladies at chancellor-crushes would bid their friends "meet me near Moltke" so much his figure rose above the average. His figure, but alas not his ability. They say he became Minister of the Interior just as Alfred Austin became poet laureate, because there were so many men all of equal suitability that it became necessary to choose someone manifestly unsuitable. He knows something of almost everything, but not everything of any one thing. Genial, cheery, a trifle supercilious, almost megalomaniac but too indifferent to most things to be ought save inconsistent, Moltke goes into Palmyra (the city of a dead palm tree and some sand) of private life because—oh, well because he put his name to the recommendation of a book he had not read! The book happened to contain abuse of the blue-black bloc and praise of the "dead" Billow. So the critics slaughtered him, not considering that for purposes of advertisement they or their fellow do the same thing in Germany 200 days in the years. "Also he pulled down the fenced cities of Judah so that the Philistines entered in and spoiled them." Or if that is not quite clear he first refused open-air meetings to the socialist and then, horrible dictu!, granted them. So he was anathema. Last but not least he was the minister nominally responsible for the electoral reform bill and is driven into the wilderness as scape-goat for the sins of . . . well the radicals say Bethmann Hollweg. To him also public men may bid a long farewell. "Staatsminister a.D.!"

Dallwitz steps into Moltke's room. Johann von Dallwitz, Junker by birth, Reactionary or Agrarian by conviction and President Supreme of the province of Silesia by the favour of Philip Prince Eulenburg. Indirectly indeed yet in effect. For this Dallwitz was Landrat in some tiny "nest:" a servant of the public nominally, a member of the bureaucratic confraternity actually, in the years of the great strife concerning a canal. His Imperial Majesty was desirous that the canal should be constructed: the landed gentry ("and with them the bureaucracy as goes without saying") were anxious that the canal should not be built. Broadly the fear was that the canal would facilitate the sale of foreign agricultural produce in the very centre of agrarianism, that is in the very districts where the domestic agricultural produce is grown. Dallwitz with others agitated against the canal-bill, and for flagrant independence (which was described as disloyalty) was placed "à disposition" by Freiherr von der Recke (Time and his revenges. Freiherr von der Recke is president of the province of Westphalia Dallwitz becomes his chief!). But "Philli" knew the danger. . . for the Crown. . . of a quarrel with the Junkers: set to work to draw his famous magic circle: put aside the quarrel: helped to secure Junker support for the Naval Bill and incidentally brought Dallwitz and the other "forty martyrs" of 1899 back into the service of the . . . oligarchy! A good-humoured face has this same Dallwitz, a bushy beard, ragged moustaches, high, arched eyebrows and deep-set eyes. One might fear for Freiherr von der Recke save that Dallwitz will scarce stay long enough (the gossips teach) to do him injury.

Behind him marches Schorlemer, master of the of the best vineyards in Moselle, now Minister of agriculture; unless the political prophets err Schorlemer is the Man of Destiny. One knows somehow very little of this strange man with his high-forehead, sunken eyes, prominent ears and drooping lip. "The Kaiser's friend" people say. Well, Schorlemer is a devout Catholic and yet stood for the Rhenish League against the Centre as political party. He "married his vineyards" and one hears they do not love him in Brauneberg, Graach and Feltingen. Yet if one trust those tight closed lips he is more nearly the man they need in modern Germany than any of those who hold more distinguished posts in Hollweg's cabinet. "One hears little of Schorlemer" . . . perchance one will soon hear more.

IV.

THE NEWSPAPER ARTICLE.

When Tokiko had gone, I turned for confirmation to the files of the paper she had mentioned. There, sure enough, I found the offending article, the gist of which was as follows:—

The girl Tokiko, of (the name of the Geisha house was omitted), aged 21, is very well spoken of for the purity of her life. Such girls may have been found in abundance among the geisha of a generation that is past: in the present generation they are almost non-existent, and the fact itself that a geisha has a reputation for special purity is enough to bring her a great deal of custom, since both entertainers and their guests like to deal with people of this class. Tokiko is a good case in point. She is always busy, and we are told that from the Restaurant she will get four or five calls a day to go and entertain their guests.

Another very admirable thing about her is that she keeps her younger brother at a middle school, making him an allowance of 20 yen a month. The mistress, however, of the house in which Tokiko serves is an extremely avaricious woman. She thinks the 20 yen that Tokiko sends her brother to be a sheer waste of good money, and she wants to have the fingering of some of it herself. She grudges the fees customarily given to the restaurant-houses by the employers of geisha, and poor Tokiko has to pay them out of her own pocket. The restaurant-keepers and their guests know this, and their respect for Tokiko is constantly increasing.

When I had read the article I put it down with a sigh. "Good people," I moralized to myself, "have to suffer for their virtues the whole world over. Some day I may have to publish the name of that geisha house-keeper."

V.

MY WIFE.

The next morning when I got home I told my wife the whole story. She evinced the liveliest sympathy for Tokiko.

I have a friend with many whims and fancies. When he had finished his course of study at Tokyo he made up his mind to retire to Kamakura, and there to take a prolonged course of zazen before entering upon the serious duties of life. To go into an office straight from school was too commonplace, he thought, and very poor fun.

When he announced his intentions all his friends disapproved of them, with the exception of Mr. Fukuzawa, to whom he went for advice. The Sage of Mita, as he was called, approved of the plan most highly, and spoke a few strong words about the inconsiderate haste with which the new-fledged graduate threw himself into a profession. Success in life, he added, did not depend upon a man's going into the world two or three years sooner or later. He thoroughly approved of the Kamakura idea. It was a great feather in my friend's cap. He had gone to Mr. Fukuzawa, half expecting to be scolded. He had been commended instead.

It would be perhaps saying a little too much to compare my wife with Mr. Fukuzawa. But I had not expected that she would show much sympathy, and I was therefore all the more pleased when I found she did.

There, was however, a good reason for my wife's sympathy for Tokiko. Some ten years ago, before we knew one another, a party of some twenty soldiers had been quartered on her father's house for about three weeks, at the end of which time they left for Tokyo. Shortly after they reached Tokyo an absurd paragraph began to go the round of the papers. It related to the desertion from military service of a certain Viscount ———. (I daresay that some of my readers may remember the case, which attracted a good deal of attention at the time. The Viscount in question has been since that time deprived of his rank and privileges, and is now working, I believe, at a buck-wheat shop somewhere in Yotsuya), well, the Viscount was then going through his period of military service and was one of the soldiers quartered on my wife's father's house. He was a flirt, and worse, and very unscrupulous. As soon as he got back to Tokyo, wearying of the monotony of the soldier's life, he deserted from the barracks but was soon afterwards captured and brought back. At his trial he made an astonishing statement. He said that he had been "carrying on" with the daughter of the house in which he had been stationed, and that the girl's parents had backed her up in the hope of some day seeing her a Viscount's lady. The story was a pure falsehood; but it went the round of all the Tokyo papers, and you may imagine how great must have been the mortification of my wife on seeing the printed slander. She refused to leave her room, she wept day and night, she talked about drowning herself. There never was such a scene. I cannot say what might have happened had not some journalistic friends in Tokyo exerted themselves to get the obnoxious paragraph contradicted and withdrawn.

With this painful experience of her own, my wife at once understood the misery of Tokiko's story, and encouraged me to give her all the help in my power.

VI.

AN INTERVIEW WITH TOKIKO.

The next afternoon, I went to a restaurant in Yoshicho, and asked the keeper to send for Tokiko. When she came I ordered tea (for I did not want to give a handle to gossip by any costly dishes or saké) and sat down for a quiet talk with the girl. It was well that I was so prudent, for as it was my interview roused the suspicions of the women servants, who were, however, quite reassured when they found that it was Tokiko and I that were talking together and that I had ordered nothing stronger than tea and a few simple cakes. And yet I was half-ashamed of myself for having been so full of precautions. It seemed to argue a sort of want of confidence in myself.

Tokiko's story was a very long one. I can but give a summary of it.

She had been born in a Samurai family at Gifu or Ogaki (I forget which). Her father was very poor, and had sold her when quite a child to a geisha house, where she started life as a hangyoku, or half-pay apprentice. From the first she had resolved to keep herself free from all intrigues and to give no encouragement to lovers whose intentions were not perfectly honourable, and though her resolution had frequently brought her into disgrace with her employers, whose minds were set on money only, she had succeeded in her endeavours. All the same, she had been dismissed by one or two of her employers for her obstinate steadfastness.

Yet she had not neglected the legitimate aims of her vocation. She studied hard to acquire all those arts and accomplishments that a geisha should have who would wish to please her patrons, and what with her skill in pleasing and her excellent reputation, had gained an entrée to many houses to which ordinary geisha were never admitted. This pleased her employers, who saw in it a hope of gain, but the more she prospered the more did her success provoke the jealousy and hatred of malicious rivals. The malice was undeserved, but it was none the less painful, and I could not but admire the constancy of this young girl who, at the age of fifteen or sixteen only, separated from her parents, with no one to counsel her, the chattel of a hard and unfeeling employer, and surrounded by jealous and spiteful rivals, had yet managed to make so fine a stand for her own purity. She was not quite without friends; amongst her patrons there were some men of chivalry and honour (I could give you their names if it were advisable), and these men joined hands to help the struggling girl.

At the close of her long story Tokiko turned to the topic about which she had telephoned to me. It would be impossible, she said, for her to remain any longer with her present mistress. She wanted therefore, first, to clear herself by discovering the anonymous author of the paragraph which had caused so much mischief, and then, to leave her present situation and to set herself up in business on her own account. This would involve some trouble and expense, and she might not be able to accomplish all that was in her mind. If she failed, she would retire into the country, and enter the household of her ancient feudal lord as a domestic servant.

VII.

I PLAY THE DETECTIVE.

So far, my conduct had been as disinterested and chivalrous as that of a mediaeval knight in European romance, who sacrificed everything to succour a damsel in distress. In the sequel I was not quite so chivalrous.

I did not anticipate much difficulty in finding out who had written the paragraph and whence he had obtained his information, for though newspaper offices are generally very chary about giving information of this kind, I fancied that this particular paper would be more amenable to reason. So I boldly went amongst the collectors of news to find out what I wanted, but, to my surprise, it took me nearly two weeks before I discovered the name of the offending writer and the probable sources of his information. In reply, I received a letter from Tokiko, thanking me for my trouble, and asking me for more information. I am sorry to say that I happened to be exceedingly busy when her letter came, and took no more trouble about it. That is where my chivalry broke down.

VIII.

I MEET TOKIKO AGAIN.

A few months later I met Tokiko again. It was at the Kabukiza Theatre, at a large entertainment given in honour of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the foundation of a certain railway company. Tokiko had been engaged as an attendant, and we ran up against one another quite unexpectedly. The place was too crowded for talking much, but she managed to let me know that she had found out a good many things for herself. The story had originated with a waitress at a rival eating-house, who had been gossiping with a newspaper man whom she was serving at supper. Tokiko had since seen the journalist in question, and with his help had succeeded in allaying her mistress's anger. "I am doing very well now," she added with a smile, "and it is all thanks to you." And she exerted herself to attend to my wants.

IX.

TOKIKO VANISHES.

Then came a long blank, during which I saw nothing of Tokiko. That summer I went to Manchuria and Korea and during the autumn I was long confined to my bed with a serious illness. On my recovery I went to Kyoto for a holiday. So I had few opportunities even of hearing about her.

When I got home to Tokyo in the winter I was told that Tokiko had run away, and that no one knew where she had gone to.

I made all sorts of enquiries, but to no purpose. The restaurant people knew nothing about her, no more did her friends. Some said that she had quarrelled with her mistress and had gone into the country; others that she was hiding somewhere in Tokyo. A third story was that she had gone to America; yet a fourth that she had been seen walking along the street in Hamachō, not far from the river. Her clothes were very shabby, and her face very pale. It was a disquieting story, and with it closed the 40th year of Meiji (1908).

X.

I MEET TOKIKO AGAIN.

One fine morning in the January of 1909 I suddenly ran across Tokiko in front of the Hakuinkan Bazaar at Shimbashi. She was exceedingly well dressed, and her hair was done in a style which betokened that she was no longer a mere geisha, but a woman doing business on her own account. She came up smiling as soon as she set eyes on me, and asked me to listen to what she had to tell me.

She told me all about her running away from her mistress. She had had to go through fire and water for some time, and had had a serious illness to boot, but she had succeeded eventually in severing the legal ties that bound her to her mistress. Now that she was free she intended to set herself up in business on her own account, under her old name of Tokiko, and she hoped I would patronize her from time to time as before.

It was a very great shock to one of my friends when he heard that I had been walking with a geisha in confidential talk up and down the Ginza. "My dear fellow!" he exclaimed, "think of the risk you run! You of all people in the world with a geisha in the Ginza. Just think! Suppose some one had seen you!"

I was glad to flatter myself with the thought that my outlook upon life was wider than his.

XI.

TOKIKO IN BUSINESS.

I now became exceedingly busy. There were the fêtes at Jamestown, and two warships were sent to take part in the celebration. Prince Fushimi and his suite started for England. There was much coming and going of distinguished personages, and my journalistic work kept me very busy. On the top of it all, I was myself despatched to London. I had no time to enquire about Tokiko.

I left Japan on the third of March; it was the middle of June before I reached Tsuruga on my return journey. I took a few days' leave to visit my kinsfolk near Wakayama, and to pay my respects to my father's grave. And then, for the first time since our rencontre on the Ginza, I heard news of Tokiko. My informant had been present on the occasion of my first introduction to her, and it was his habit always to go and see her once at least during his annual trip to the capital. She had carried out her intention, he said, of setting herself up in business on her own account; her name was as unsullied as ever, and she was prospering. I felt that a heavy burden had been taken off my mind.

XII.

I MEET HER AGAIN.

Last January, on my way home from a long round of New Year's calls, I dropped in at the restaurant in Yoshi-chō and ordered some lunch. It so happened that Tokiko was in attendance on a party in the next room to mine, and when she heard that I was there she came in to see me.

She told me all the difficulties she had experienced in setting herself up in business on her own account, and then added, quite abruptly: "I have made up my mind to remain a geisha all my life."

I warmly approved of her resolution. The period of geisha-hood is a short and a merry one, as a rule, and the life is in a state of perpetual flux. A man goes away from Tokyo for a couple of years; when he comes back he finds that he hardly knows a single geisha. His old friends have retired from the business, or have found favour with some one and gone away to be married. If there are any of the old ones left one may be sure that they have in some way or other played their cards badly and made a mess of their lives. Now there is no companionship to be got either out of the thoughtless young girls or out of the older ones whose lives have been spoiled. There is room for the elderly staid geisha, the sensible woman who can really and in a good sense interest and amuse her customers without demoralizing them, and it was for this reason that I applauded Tokiko's resolution to devote herself to her vocation for her life-time.

But at the same time I advised her to get married. No one would blame her for getting married, nor would the fact of her having a husband detract in any way from her powers of entertaining and amusing. On the contrary, it would be a safeguard. I advised her therefore to marry, not some unprincipled Bohemian who would drag her down to his own poor level, but some gentleman of worth who would give her a solid, comfortable home and a proper place in the world.

I had long cherished these thoughts for Tokiko, but had never yet had the opportunity of broaching them to her. She listened to me patiently and smilingly, as I cited the instances of famous singers in Europe who were married and yet followed their artistic vocations. And then, all of a sudden, she burst out weeping. And well she might.

XIII.

TOKIKO'S SECRET.

For now, for the first time, she disclosed to me her secret history.

She had once had a lover, a youth of her own age, whom, as a happy girl of seventeen, she had met daily during a long and ever memorable summer at Oiso. They were mere children, but they had been much in one another's company, and they fell in love with each other and made mutual promises of marriage. Then the boy's parents got to know of it, and though the engagement was not absolutely broken off, the young man was sent to London to pursue his studies. Tokiko, for her part, was made to promise that she would not write to him for ten years, so as not to disturb him in his work. She had faithfully kept her promise, but no lapse of time had been able to efface the young man from her memory.

Tokiko would not give me her lover's name. She said he was a man of good family, and that before going to London he had told his parents of his unalterable resolution to marry her as soon as he came back. The family had always been very kind to her. She occasionally made a formal call at the house: when she was in anxiety about her brother they had offered to help her with his school expenses, but she had declined: and occasionally she was engaged to go there in her professional capacity. At such times she had to be very careful not to presume on her acquaintance.

For her lover's sake she lived with the greatest circumspection. She never wrote to him, but her thoughts were ever about his welfare.

But the more she came to know of her lover's family, the more full of anxiety did she become, lest her intrusion into the house should prove to be the cause of discord and disunion, of misery to her lover, his family and herself. "I have thought the matter well over from every point," she said, "and I have come to the conclusion that I must break it off. That is why I am going to be a geisha all my life."

I have since come to know the family of Tokiko's lover, and Tokiko's lover himself. For the life of me I could not see what she saw in the young man to love; but there is no doubt of the sacrifice she made in throwing away her chances of entering his family.

THE PREVENTION OF CONSUMPTION.

The National Association for the prevention of consumption and other forms of tuberculosis is undertaking a new education campaign. A special appeal committee, of which Lord Derby is chairman and the Duke of Devonshire and Mr. Waldorf Astor are joint hon. treasurers, has been appointed, says The Times, to collect funds for the campaign, which is to be carried out by means of travelling tuberculosis exhibitions, caravans with lantern slides, popular lectures, an information bureau for the Press and public, and the distribution of leaflets. The committee estimate that a campaign on these lines, to be efficient, would not cost less than £5,000 annually (including office expenses). The campaign will be purely educational, and no grants will be made to institutions for treatment.

In the appeal to the public which the committee are issuing it is stated that from 350,000 to 400,000 persons are suffering from tuberculosis in the United Kingdom; that 60,000 die annually from consumption and 30,000 from other forms of tuberculosis; and that one person out of every ten dies of consumption. It is established that Poor Law institutions are spending annually £1,500,000, friendly societies £1,250,000, and charitable institutions £500,000 on the relief of consumption; that the working classes are losing £3,000,000 a year in wages in consequence of sickness arising from the disease; and that the total direct and indirect loss to the country is £8,000,000 a year.

THE NEW JAPANESE TARIFF.

The following has been sent us for publication:
TO THE EDITOR OF THE "EVENING POST."

SIR,—The Evening Post just arrived has a letter on the "New Japanese Tariff." It compares the new tariff with the "old tariff," but nowhere hints that the "old tariff" may be interpreted in two radically different senses: (1.) The "old tariff," with which comparisons are made, is the general tariff law which has but a very restricted application in practice. (2.) The "old tariff," which in practice applies to most Japanese imports, is a conventional tariff. It rests on treaties with Great Britain, France and Germany, and is extended by "most favoured nation" treaties to twenty countries (including also most of their colonies), which comprise all American and European countries having any considerable commerce with Japan. The conventional tariffs expire July 1911. What primarily interests Americans and Europeans is therefore to know how the new tariff rates, then to take effect, compare with the conventional tariff rates which now apply. The simple answer is that in almost every case the new rates represent an enormous increase over the present conventional rates. Furthermore, it is well understood that Japan has no thought of greatly reducing the new rates by treaty, because tariff arrangements in other countries give her no hope of obtaining adequate return for important reductions. For certain political concessions—viz., with reference to immigration to the United States, the surrender of perpetual lease rights held by foreigners—Japan would probably give large concessions, but there seems little prospect of such agreements.

The second paragraph illustrates "some marked reductions in the new tariff" by stating (1) that the new tariff imposes a duty of 100 yen per 100 litres of champagne, instead of 240 yen in the "old tariff"; and (2), that the new tariff reduces the wine duty "from 30 yen to 12 per 100 litres." The facts follow: (1.) On champagne, the conventional tariff imposes 1.55 yen per case of the dozen litres, or two dozen half-litres—i.e., 12.92 yen per 100 litres, instead of 240 yen! The general tariff duty for champagne is 200 yen per 100 litres (not 240 as stated in the correspondence), but probably not one litre has ever paid duty on that basis. (2) On wines the conventional tariff imposes duties under two classes. Wines not exceeding 16 degrees of alcohol are dutiable at the rate of 1.242 yen per 100 litres if in cask, and 6.33 yen if in bottle. Wines of 16-24 degrees of alcohol are dutiable at 7.925 yen per 100 litres in cask, and 5.67 yen in bottle—these rates instead of the 30 yen stated in the correspondence. The general tariff rates on wines would be 80 yen per 100 litres in bottle and 30 yen in cask, but probably not one litre actually pays duty under the general tariff. The facts are, therefore, that the new tariff rates will be on champagne over 7, on wines 1-3—ten times those actually paid at present!

The third paragraph, concerning tobacco, is similarly inaccurate. In 1904, the Government established a monopoly of tobacco manufacture and trade. The monopoly bureau itself imports nearly all of the foreign tobacco which enters the country, according to law. It supplies the imported product to licensed agents, fixing prices for each variety, as it does for the home product. There is a provision that private persons may, under certain conditions, import special brands of tobacco for their own consumption, and to meet this case a rate of duty in the general tariff must be stated. But this nominal privilege of the consumer is so entangled in "red tape" and in difficulties, delays, and annoyances arranged by the monopoly bureau "for its protection," that few persons venture to exercise the privilege, and so the amount of tobacco imported under it is a negligible quantity. Furthermore, as far back as December, 1907, the monopoly bureau tuned its prices to the key of the new tariff—so that the new tariff will probably have no practical effects on tobacco, tobacco consumers, or tobacco business.

In the fifth and final paragraph is the statement that "the old rate of 30 per cent. ad valorem has been reduced in the new tariff to 15 per cent. in the case of wire, iron rods, and bar iron." Here again the rates actually paid under the conventional tariff are 5.7½ per cent., so that what purports to be a 50 per cent. reduction turns out to be an increase of 100-200 per cent. over actual rates. As for locomotives and machinery, mentioned in the paragraph, the conventional tariff rates on locomotives, railway cars, and parts of both are 5 per cent. The new tariff imposes duties four to five times the actual rates on these things. There are a few reductions of duty on items of machinery not subject to conventional tariff, in cases where the old general tariff rates have been prohibitive or have arrested the progress of industries requiring the machines. But such are exceptions. The rule for iron and machinery is not "important reductions in the rates," but great increase over actual rates—duties which range from 20 to 40 per cent.

Turning back to the first paragraph of the correspondence, we read "that the new tariff is not expected to increase the national revenue by more than fifteen million yen annually." Would it not radically affect the implication to add that this 15 million would be 43.3 per cent. of the total customs revenue in 1909 (35,438,373 yen), or 32 per cent. of the total customs revenue in 1907 (46,959,596 yen), which represents Japan's maximum?

My facts are all taken from official sources, which you can verify. You will find a copy of the old general tariff law, with schedules, also conventional tariff rates, names of countries having "most-favoured-nation" treatment, etc., in the "Sixth Financial and Economic Annual of Japan, 1906," published by the Department of Finance, Appendix pp. 25-59. My statistics are taken from the ninth number of the same publication; and, especially the most recent statistics, from the "Monthly Return of the Foreign Trade of the Empire of Japan, December, 1909," published by the Department of Finance. For rates of the new tariff, I have used the translation of the Japan Mail, which is unofficial, but usually accurate and reliable.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"DIRECT TRADE."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL")

SIR,—The leading article in your issue of 28th ult. headed "Direct Trade" attracted my attention as a very old resident foreign merchant and seemed to invite comment, but until now I have not had time to put my views in regard to it on paper.

I feel in the first place that I must take exception to your statement that the expulsion of two-sworded men from the Settlement led to the exodus of all high class Japanese merchants and that thereafter all reputable traders held aloof from the place, because this implies an altogether too sweeping condemnation of the Japanese merchants we came in contact with in the early days. Personally I have no recollection of the incident you mention, and was under the impression that the edict against wearing two swords was issued much later than the period to which you allude. As regards the reputation of the early days' Japanese merchants, I have in mind as I write two Tokyo firms, dealers in Manchester goods, whose representatives used to come daily to Yokohama to make their purchases and who were as upright and honourable business men as it has ever been my lot to meet in any part of the world. Men whose word was indeed as good as their bond, but who nevertheless did not hesitate to sign a contract and to pay bargain money too, because it was the custom to do so. These firms had been established for many years before foreigners came to Yokohama, and still exist. What is more, they live up to their reputation, and are certainly not "the remnants of an evil past—" far from it. I wish all the new school of merchants had half the regard these old firms have for their good name. There would then be less talk of the unreliableness and commercial immorality of Japanese traders.

That expression, "remnants of an evil past," which you so often make use of has always puzzled me, and to this day I don't really know what it means. Certainly not the large company of merchants, both Import and Export, who did business with us from 1864 onwards and of whom I have cited two bright examples. Rather must it refer, I judge, to the army of Japanese brokers and middlemen who exploited the Settlement as trade developed, men of no means but who posed as representatives of merchants in the background, and when void of bonafide orders from principals made contracts without any one behind them, unknown to or connived at by unscrupulous bantos as the case might be, contracts to be implemented if everything went right, but with no thought of fulfilment if the market was against them on arrival of the goods, as so often happened. These were the men too, no doubt, who made unreasonable claims with all the attendant worry and vexation which has made Japan a byword for bad faith in Lancashire and Yorkshire.

As regards the Ni Azukari affair, if my memory serves me right, that had to deal with raw silk only, and speaking generally has really no connection with the subject of your article. Your reference to Sir Harry Parkes is to the point. From the earliest days he did not have to be approached, but himself invariably sought the opinion of British Merchants on all important commercial questions before committing himself to a fixed line of policy, thus engendering a feeling of mutual confidence that had most gratifying results. After his return to Tokyo in 1881/1882 he followed the same practice and I had the honour of being one of a consultative committee of four British merchants, nominated by Sir Harry himself and with whom he held many conferences.

Yours truly, JAMES P. MOLLISON.

[The veto against two-sworded men's entry into Yokohama was long anterior to the veto against wearing swords. The expression "remnants of an evil past" occurred in a memorial addressed by the British merchants of Yokohama to Sir Francis Plunkett. As for the Ni-azukarijo, if our correspondent will refer to our article he will easily recognise the connexion.—Ed. J.M.]

JAPAN'S NEW CUSTOMS TARIFF.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—As a letter from me to the Editor of The Times on the above subject has been mentioned by Reuter, I beg to enclose a copy of it in case it may be of interest to you.

I am, Sir, yours very truly,

JAPAN'S NEW CUSTOMS TARIFF.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I must apologise for sending this letter to you instead of to an engineering journal, but as The Times, besides its leading position in England, is the only newspaper whose opinion is considered of any value by the Japanese Government and people, my reason for doing so is obvious.

Those resident in this country fully recognise that the Japanese Government is justified in increasing the rates of import duty so that the national industries and manufactures may be encouraged, especially as the extension of these will provide a future for the thousands of most industrious students, who, at present, have nothing to look forward to after leaving school or one of the universities. At the same time no Briton can possibly admit that Japan's best friend should in consequence suffer out of all proportion to other countries. That this will be the case, the following will prove.

The present rates of import duty on machine tools; cranes; hydraulic machinery; pumps; steam, oil and gas engines; spinning and weaving machinery; boilers &c. is 15 per cent. ad valorem, and on printing machinery 5 per cent. ad valorem; the imports from all countries being charged alike.

The new duties, coming into force next year, instead of being charged on value, as at present, will be charged specifically, and in the case of the above-mentioned articles, and many others, by weight. As British machines, producing the same results, are heavier than those of other countries, they will have to bear a proportionately higher rate. To show how this works out, I give the results of thirty-six calculations showing the effect the new rate of duty will have on printing machines, and how we shall be placed in competition with other countries interested in this market.

The new duties are, as follows.—

Printing Machinery not weighing more than 250 kilograms (552lbs.) 20 per cent. Printing Machinery all others, yen 5.90 per 100 kin (12/0½d. per 132.277lbs. or £10...3...11d. per ton, Avoird.)

Leaving out the first clause, for no printing machines are so light as mentioned in it, the second need only be considered. By it, machines of British manufacture will have in future to meet duties of from 19 per cent. to 28 per cent. on their cost, whereas German machines will, in like manner, only pay duties of from 10 per cent. to 17 per cent., and American from 9 per cent. to 18 per cent. Is this fair?

It may also be asked. Is it wise? For it comes to this, with almost all machinery, that the higher the price and the flimsier the construction the less will be the per centage of duty charged.

When the new duties are in force the Japanese Government will practically say to its nationals; Though we are aware that heavy machines run smoother and last longer than light machines do, and that they are also less liable to break down, still, should two machines producing the same results be offered you at the same price, we will tax you a larger amount if you purchase the heavier one.

Englishmen have always prided themselves on the substantiality of their machines, but, as far as this market is concerned, this will in future prove to be a disadvantage.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

T. RUDDIMAN JOHNSTON.
The Editor, The Times.

Tokyo, 2nd June, 1910.

DR. KIKUCHI.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—“American” will without doubt agree with me that we would be lacking in the element of gentility, if we did not acknowledge Dr. Kikuchi's reply to our strictures. I am entirely satisfied with his rejoinder, and glad to have the corroboration of Dr. Emil Schiller. Although basing my opinions on a wrongly reported article, and although writing with severity, I am not sorry that I did so write. For it has set Dr. Kikuchi right among the Americans who read the so-called report of his address. Hundreds of copies of the Japan Mail and Kobe Herald ultimately reach America. Not all of Dr. Kikuchi's American friends, “who know him so well,” would have been unaffected by those uncontradicted reports.

I submit that so long as public men take the irresponsible attitude of “making it a rule” not to reply to newspaper criticisms and misrepresented reports of addresses, they have no right to blame the rest of us for basing our opinions on what the newspapers report. It is not our business to verify. It is this very decision on the part of public men to allow the newspapers to report what they jolly well please, which causes newspapers to distort and misreport. They know the “rule,” and abuse the public. If public men would organize themselves into a Clean Press Association, it would take very little time to put a stop to this abuse, so especially noticeable in Japan. The newspapers know where their patronage comes from, and would get good in short order.

Sincerely,

WEA.

[We entirely agree with “Wea.”—Ed. J.M.]

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE “JAPAN MAIL.”)

SIR:—It again gives me much pleasure to voice the coincidence of my views with those of your correspondent “Wea,” as expressed in the latter's communication appearing in your issue of the 4th inst., relative to Dr. Kikuchi.

It was gratifying to learn from Dr. Kikuchi's straightforward letter appearing in your issue of the 28th ult. that he did not give utterance to the sentiments attributed to him regarding the women of America, although the fact that he was so grossly misrepresented is none the less to be deplored.

I cannot to the slightest extent agree with the assertion contained in a letter in your issue of June 29th signed “Emil Schiller,” to the effect that my criticisms were “out of place” and “harmful to a good cause”; I aver the contrary, for reasons which are surely patent. I beg to assure your correspondent that I was labouring under no “excitement”; I did, however, feel a certain amount of resentment tinged with indifference, which caused me to express my approval of the criticisms of your correspondent “Wea.”

(REUTER'S SERVICE.)

THE BRITISH BUDGET.

London, July 1.

Mr. Lloyd George, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, introducing the Budget into the House, said there were no new taxes and no change in duties. The constitutional question had had a direct damaging influence on the finances and had produced a deficiency of £26,248,000. The Government had therefore to provide for a total expenditure in 1910-11 of £198,930,000, which included a naval expenditure of 40½ million sterling. It is estimated that the revenue will be £199,791,000, showing a surplus over expenditure of £861,000. This revenue includes arrears from last year amounting to £30,046,000, of which sum £26,500,000 have already been collected. The Government will not take off the spirit duty, as such action would be a crime against the State, in view of the diminished drunkenness. The trade outlook was distinctly bright. Mr. Lloyd George said he anticipates an increased yield of £521,000 from tea and £2,500,000 from death duties. The rubber and oil booms, he said, had been most productive regarding stamp duties. The surplus of the Budget will be devoted partly to technical education and partly to removing the pauper disqualification for the old age pension, and ultimately the Government will have a working balance of £309,000.

THE TEA DUTIES IN BUDGET.

Later.

The tea resolution has been adopted without a division.

APPROVAL OF FRENCH GOVERNMENT'S POLICY.

OPPOSITION VIEW OF BUDGET.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain, speaking in the House, condemned Mr. Lloyd George's over-optimistic views of finance. He said that the surplus claimed was merely the work of imagination. The Government instead of fulfilling its pledges of economy had, he said, increased the expenditure by 11 million sterling.

REJECTION OF ELECTORAL BILL.

London, July 2.

New York.—The State Assembly and Senate at Albany have rejected the Electoral Bill, the adoption of which was recommended by Mr. Roosevelt in his first public pronouncement since his return to America.

THE JAPANESE TARIFF.

London, July 3.

The Japanese tariff continues to form the subject of serious criticism. The Times publishes a letter from Mr. Ruddiman Johnston, dated from Tokyo, emphasizing the fact that the tariff favours flimsy machinery at the expense of the more solid and lasting British machinery, notably in the case of printing machines.

THE RAILWAY PANIC IN THE U.S.

A semi-official statement has been published for the purpose of tranquillizing the minds of American and European investors. It declares that the Interstate Commerce Commission will do nothing to jeopardize the interests of investors or those under the legitimate business of railways.

The statement has stimulated the European buying of American railway stocks.

FINLAND.

The Government of Finland Bill has been sanctioned by the Tsar and is now law.

THE PRIZE FIGHT.

The first three rounds were simply wrestling bouts. Jeffries was best in the fourth, drawing first blood. Thereafter the fight became faster. Johnson's straight lefts and upper cuts on the face were the most effective. His blows were snappy and clean, while, in contrast, Jeffries did a lot of shoving.

In the sixth round Johnson cut Jeffries' cheek to the bone and closed his right eye. From now on the black man punished his opponent's face severely. In the eleventh round Jeffries became tired and slow: his nose and lips were bleeding. He tried to close, but Johnson prevented this. The crowd cheered the negro's boxing. In the fifteenth round following a clinch, Johnson forced the pace and sent Jeffries down with a left and right on the jaw. Each time Jeffries got up Johnson sprang at him tiger-like and swung lefts on the jaw, finally sending Jeffries through the ropes. He was counted out and then led back to his corner dazed. Johnson in the centre of the ring was breathing normally and unhurt.

The ring was quickly dismantled by souvenir hunters. The purse was increased to 121,000 dollars, the loser to receive 40 instead of the original 25 per cent., Johnson refusing to fight otherwise.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE CONVENTION SIGNED.

London, July 6.

The Protecting Powers are discussing the steps to be taken in the event of the Cretan Assembly, on reassembling, insisting on the Moslem deputies taking the oath of allegiance to the King of the Hellenes, which action is increasingly probable. It is believed that if the Assembly does so, an international force will be landed.

THE AFTERMATH OF THE PRIZE FIGHT.

The Mayors of many cities in the United States have prohibited the cinematograph pictures of the Johnson-Jeffries fight. There are strong fears that the cinematograph pictures would inflame the feeling of both whites and blacks.

The South African Press deprecates the use of the cinematograph pictures in South Africa, owing to the effect that would be produced on the coloured people, who are already impressed by Johnson's victory.

There will, he said, be nine millions sterling available in the present year for the reduction of the national debt.

FROM STRENGTH TO STRENGTH.

A SERMON PREACHED BY THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY ON THE SUNDAY (MAY 8) AFTER THE DEATH OF KING EDWARD VII.

"They go from strength to strength."—PSALM lxxxiv. 7.

Who wrote this Psalm, or when, we do not know. And it matters little. It is one of the Psalms which belong to all time and are a possession for everybody. The poet teaches us to look forth upon a life, whether of a man or a nation, "moving through variety of circumstance, through achievements and delays, through discipline and sorrow," with, on the whole, continuous gain. It is the main lesson of the Old Testament, the divinely ordered life of a people, who moved, who grew, notwithstanding all their faults and failures, "from strength to strength." We see clearly enough the Divine ordering, the Divine discipline, when the Bible brings it out for us. Are you sure that we should have seen it in the narrative of Israel's life if it had been told by common chroniclers? Or would England's story be less sacred than that, less impregnate with evidence of Divine guidance, if we had ears to hear and eyes to see? No place on earth can better help us to answer that question than Westminster Abbey. No period of English history—of that I am quite persuaded—draws the picture or bears the message more clearly than these years of our own lifetime. We may have missed or misused the opportunity of vision or of action. But beyond all question it has been ours. Why are these aisles thronged, beyond ordinary throng, to night? Something has happened. Yes, and that something is not an isolated incident or calamity out of touch with our island story as a whole. It is a bit of "revelation"—the unveiling of the Divine guidance and discipline of our people's life. Regard it rightly, and we shall find it not alien to our thought, "From strength to strength."

Very valuable in a nation's life is the note of unity which is struck by what may be called the common ownership of a central home. It has often been pointed out that a striking result of the creation and growth of those high offices which break the level monotony of ordinary life, is that they bring before us common things, common joys and anxieties and sorrows, in a form at once personal and public. To some extent this is always true. It is overwhelmingly true when the central home is simply and genuinely endeared to the hearts of the people. That endearment is a living factor in English life to day. And wide experience has taught us how it is through the central home and household of a nation's life—the representative home in which everybody claims a share—that a trumpet-call to the people at large can ring out in clearest note, whether it be a call to thanksgiving, or to patient waiting, or to stern conflict, or to high enterprise and hope, or to the quiet facing of sudden bereavement and loss. Most of us who are here to-night have, within our own memory, heard every one of those national trumpet-calls.

There are probably none here who can recollect the bright summer day seventy-two years ago, when the nobles and commons and clergy of England were gathered on this spot, to do something new in English life—"to welcome to the throne a Sovereign whose youthful promise and queenly grace awakened again a flame of loyal devotion, a spring of serious hope such as men thought had well-nigh died out from amongst us."

That seems far-off history now. But we can most of us remember how, half a century later, in 1887, within and around the Abbey's storied walls the children and grandchildren of those who had knelt here on Queen Victoria's Coronation Day met as mature or perhaps old men and women to thank the Lord of Heaven and earth for the answer given to their fathers' prayer in the fifty years of wise and firm and gentle rule which, through cloud and sunshine, she had wielded since she vowed her maiden vow upon this self-same spot. "From strength to strength." When, ten years later, the great pageant from every part of an Empire which has had no parallel on earth moved through the streets to St. Paul's Cathedral, the mingled shouts and tears of loyalty and joy were again only the surface token of what lay behind and below, the deep-hearted thankfulness of a Christian people for God's overflowing answer to their prayers "From strength to strength." When, four years later, in 1901, we bore her to her honoured rest, and the solemn booming of the guns along the sea symbolised a grateful sorrow which was perhaps more truly world-wide than any single human sentiment has at one moment ever been, we sorrowed not—even in the lower, the secular, the national sense—as people without hope. "From strength to strength." The murky war-clouds were already lifting when she passed to her rest, or to other ministries of service beyond our ken. They rolled away leaving our country surely for the time robust through the discipline that those years had brought.

Are we sure that we have held quite steadily—in the common social and industrial life of town and country—to the lessons of those years? Is there any fear of our slipping carelessly back into a commoner and more selfish groove, a mood much easier and less strenuous? Ask yourselves the question now, "Lest we forget."

And when eight years ago we were summoned hither to crown the King, who was to bear forward in his turn the solemn yet inspiring trust, men greeted the summons with what was almost lightness of heart. "The whole world," said a prominent writer—"the whole world seems resolved to make King Edward next week its central figure." And then again a trumpet-call, to give us a message that we needed. "From strength to strength." In a single forenoon, some forty-eight hours before the moment when every eye and heart were to be fixed upon the ancient chair in this Abbey choir, we were suddenly summoned to look elsewhere instead—to look away from "That immemorial regal stone.

Symbol of sovereignty," away from the streets

"Where the long glories prance and triumph by," and to turn instead to the hushed sick-room, to lift our hands in silent prayer to the Lord to Whom alone belong the issues of life and death, and to wait, and to be still. Who that was present on this very spot on June 24, 1902, when upon the little crowd of busy men and women, notables and musicians and artificers, making active, bustling, eager preparation for the glad day, there fell the tidings that the King was stricken with grave illness, and they kneeled down and prayed—who that was with us at that noontide can forget it while life lasts?

Through the days that followed we waited, we said our prayers; and again, as had happened to him thirty years before, he passed back from the very gates of death into the highway of strenuous life—this time into the life of exacting service, of anxious public care, of unremitting and ennobling responsibility, which, with ever-deepening love and thankfulness, we have watched and known.

"From strength to strength." Does any thoughtful man doubt that to the solemn facts of those crowded and eventful weeks—when men "feared as they entered into the cloud"—the English people and the English King owed a lasting debt? Thousands who had looked upon a coronation as a mere pageant awoke to find in it a stirring, a solemn, a practical reminder of the mutual and joint answerableness of King and people to the living God, "by Whom alone Kings reign and Princes decree justice." Need I remind you of the words of the great service itself?—

"With this Sword do justice, stop the growth of iniquity, protect the Holy Church of God, help and defend widows and orphans, restore the things that are gone to decay, maintain the things that are restored, punish and reform what is amiss, and confirm what is in good order."

And again—

"Receive this Imperial Robe and Orb: . . . and when you see this Orb set under the Cross, remember that the whole world is subject to the Power and Empire of Christ our Redeemer."

And again—

"The Lord God Almighty grant that . . . all the people of the land fearing God, and honouring the King, may by the merciful superintendency of the Divine Providence, and the vigilant care of our gracious Sovereign, continually enjoy peace, plenty, and prosperity; through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Brothers and sisters, so we prayed eight years ago for our King and for his people. Those prayers were not in vain. "From strength to strength."

And what am I to say about the message which has come to us now? the solemn trumpet-call which has just rung out? Can we again turn to our text and use it—"From strength to strength"? I think we can. Four days ago the last thought in anybody's mind—as men looked out into the misty conflict of political life and listened to the strife of tongues—was that the central figure of all might be taken suddenly from our head. We had learned to count unhesitatingly upon the mature sobriety of his quiet judgment of affairs, upon his tactful and experienced estimate of men and things, upon the ripe and varied knowledge which he possessed of State policy in its largest sense, upon the unchallengeable fairness of his constitutional attitude amid the cross currents of political and social strife. And, for the moment at all events, we are simply bewildered by the sudden closing of the door and the ending of his present-day service to the Empire whose initial confidence in him had been from his accession onwards, deliberately deepened and maintained. Charm of personal presence and kindness is of priceless value to the man who is called upon to hold a position so perilous in its greatness of opportunity—opportunity of use or misuse. But it needs more than personal charm, more than experience or tact or kindness, to carry aright the burden which lies upon a Sovereign's shoulders. There must be a large and steady sense of public duty. There must be a genuine and far-reaching care to maintain the honour of a great people and to rule worthily of its high traditions. And in an Empire as varied and as vast as ours there must be an effective interest in the mutual responsibilities and the interdependent life of races and of classes and of creeds. And withal, for the whole world's sake, there must, in such a position, be a deliberate and persistent determination to seek peace and ensue it.

The very enumeration is enough to make one bow the head in prayer for any man or woman upon earth to whom so mighty a trust is given. How easy to make, on this side or that, a mistake which may have immeasurable and disastrous consequence! We are allowed, in the quiet retrospect which this solemn week brings, to ask whether we can see, in these nine busy years, mistakes of sovereignty which might thus become seed-plots of ill. If we cannot, dare we—above all, dare we on this hallowed spot—disconnect that fact from our prayers and his upon his Coronation Day? "From strength to strength."

And suddenly—in a few hours—when no man looked for it, the life here is ended. In the presence of those who loved him best, and with the same quiet courage which had looked death in the face eight years ago, he passed—it is not yet forty-eight hours since—into the life beyond our ken. To-day the whole round world is commending to our Father's keeping and consolation our widowed Queen, who tended his last earthly hours with the gentle love which for all these years has knit to her in imperishable bonds the heart of the whole peoples of our race. In reverent and loving sympathy we invoke the Divine blessing upon every member of that Royal home. It would be irreverent to dwell upon what this sorrow means to them; but they know, and we know, the place they hold in all our hearts and prayers.

But, my friends, there is another word which it is our privilege to say to-night. We look outward and onward in eager and expectant hope to the lifework of him who is called, with a suddenness almost fearful in its rush, to the greatest post of rule among the sons of men. It is strange how often what is called the sors liturgica, the accident of our appointed lesson of Holy Scripture, has a startling appropriateness to the facts of the hour. We have listened this evening to familiar words. But though they fell to be read in ordinary course to-night, they rang out—is it not so?—with a fresh significance.

"Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise . . . Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed; for the Lord thy God is with thee."

Those who listened yesterday to the quiet words of the brave, resolute, straightforward man, of high purpose and of simple and disciplined life, who is called in the prime of his manhood to take up duties so overwhelming in their greatness, have cause surely for thankfulness and hope. Thousands have already read them. They will tomorrow be in the hands of the whole Empire.

"My heart is too full for me to address you to-day in more than a few words. . . . I have lost not only a father's love, but the affectionate and intimate relations of a dear friend and adviser. . . . To endeavour to follow in his footsteps, and at the same time to uphold the constitutional government of these realms, will be the eararest object of my life. I am deeply sensible of the very heavy responsibilities which have fallen upon me. I know that I can rely upon Parliament and upon the people of these Islands and of my Dominions beyond the Seas for their help in the discharge of these arduous duties, and for their prayers that God will grant me strength and guidance. I am encouraged by the knowledge that I have in my dear wife one who will be a constant helpmate in every endeavour for our people's good."

There is no man or woman (may we not say this?)—there is no man or woman within these walls but will to-night pray God to help our King—our King—to make those humble, hopeful, high resolves come true. "From strength to strength." The promise of early years, the reverent answer to the sudden, the unexpected call—these will bear fruit, under God's guiding hand, for him and for his Empire's good. It would be faithless to doubt it. God save the King! God have him and those near and dear to him in His holy keeping day by day!

One word more. We have spoken of the King whom we have lost, and of the King whom we have gained. But the message is for us all. "From strength to strength." Do you doubt that if the story of this memorable week, the summary and outcome of many memorable years, had been told to us in Holy Scripture, say by an Isaiah, or an Amos, or an Ezra, we should have been stirred to the depths of our being by the clearness of its message, the clearness and certainty of the call God is making upon every single one of us to do our part in quiet, consistent loyalty to Him our living Lord? We have often been advised by our best teachers to search the history of our own people for the realities of God. "We are a people"—said a great speaker in the English Parliament two centuries and a half ago—"we are a people with the stamp of God upon us. . . . Whose appearances and providences among us are not to be outmatched by any story." "His appearances and providences among us." Now, if ever—this week, if ever—they are here, they are potent and voiceful in the stress alike of joy and sorrow, of bereavement and anxiety and hope. And if the message of the past will shape itself—as it can—into the resolve of the present, and that into humble, expectant prayer for the coming days, the outcome is sure. "From strength to strength."

"O God, we have heard with our ears and our fathers have declared unto us, the noble works that Thou didst in their days and in thp old time before them. . . . O Lord, arise, hele us, and deliver us for Thine honour."

JAPANESE TARIFFS.

The Calico Printers' Association of Manchester has sent the following letter to The Times:—

Sir,—Adverting to the proposed rates of duty on printed cotton piece goods, we have selected five of the qualities most largely exported to Japan, and the following comparative table, which has been carefully compiled, may be of interest to your readers:—

No.	Quality.	Present duty.	Proposed new duty.	Actual increase in duty.	Percentage of increase.
1	per 120 yds.	2s. 5d.	5s. 2'16d.	2s. 9'16d.	114.34
2	per 24 yds.	5'8d	1s. 1'112d.	8'32d.	143.45
3	per 120 yds.	2s. 5d.	6s. 5'7d.	4s. 0'7d.	167.93
4	per 120 yds.	2s. 5d.	7s. 9'24d.	5s. 4'24d.	221.52
5	per 120 yds.	2s. 5d.	5s. 9'9d.	3s. 4'9d.	141.04

Although the new tariff may not be specifically aimed at Great Britain, its effect will prejudice British printers more severely than their Continental competitors, for of the cotton prints imported by Japan during the years 1905 to 1908 Great Britain supplied from 90 to 94 per cent., whilst no other European nation sent more than 3 per cent.

As regards cotton flannels, Great Britain's share of Japanese imports was 51 per cent. in 1908 and 33 per cent. in 1907, whilst Germany came next with 35½ per cent. and 33¼ per cent. respectively. On this class of goods the increase in duty under the new tariff is not so great.

In the case of two qualities the effect would be as follows:—

Quality.	Present duty.	Proposed new duty.	Actual increase in duty.	Percentage of increase.
No. 1 per 93 yds.	3s. 3'52d.	4s. 10'46d.
No. 2 per 93 yds.	3s. 5'85d.	4s. 1'20d.
			Actual increase in duty.	Percentage of increase.
No. 1 per 93 yds.		1s. 6'94d.		47.93
No. 2 per 93 yds.		7'3d.		17.56

Our figures as to imports are taken from the official statistics of the Japanese Department of Finance at Tokio, those for 1909 not yet being published.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE cruiser Ikoma is officially reported to have arrived at St. Vincent on the 29th ultimo.

A HONGKONG despatch says that the drydock Derwey was successfully refloated on Wednesday.

THE cruiser Ikoma is officially reported to have arrived at Las Palmas, Canary Islands, on the 4th instant.

ON Thursday the Korean warship Rynkt ran on a rock while proceeding from Gensan to Fusan, The crew were saved.

THE notorious bandit Yeung Tse-ting, of Ling-shan, has been captured by the French in the Kwong on district of Cambodia. Yeung, says the S.-C. Morning Post, has many robberies and murders against his name and the Chinese authorities have applied to the French Court for the man to be handed over for trial. The Court replied it would extradite him immediately.

THE Aso and Soya of the Training Squadron, under command of Rear-Admiral Ichiji, returned safely to Kure on Sunday morning after their long cruise. Prince Teruhisa and all the cadets on board are in excellent health.

THE Portuguese warship Vasco da Gama was the first foreign vessel that entered Port Arthur since its opening. She was followed by the British Alacrity, which steamed into the harbour on the 3rd instant, with Vice-Admiral Winsloe on board.

THE collier Shinko Maru, lying at Moji, on board which a fire occurred a few days ago, is found to have sustained no small damage to her engines. It is expected that the vessel will lie at anchor for about a month to undergo the necessary repairs.

THE Inter-Collegiate (American) Football Rules Committee has materially changed the rules with a view to the safety of the players, but without eliminating the spectacular side of the game. The "forward pass," however, one of the most dangerous formations, has been retained unrestricted.

MR. ARIYOSHI, who has recently been appointed Chief of the General Affairs Bureau in the Residency-General, is reported to be suffering from a severe stomach complaint. He has therefore postponed his departure for the new post, and is now under medical treatment in Chiba Hospital.

CHINA has agreed to compensate the Chinese Eastern Railway to the extent of $160,000 for timber recently destroyed by Hunghutze, according to the Peking correspondent of the N.-C. Daily News. Russian troops are guarding the railway pending the arrival of a Chinese force sufficient to cope with the outlaws.

THE Teheran correspondent of the Vossische Zeitung telegraphs that consternation has been caused by the news of the occupation by the British of the town of Bampur, a Persian possession in Baluchistan. It is feared that this is a preliminary to the occupation of Southern Persia by Great Britain and the occupation of Northern Persia by Russia.

MR. BALFOUR won the Parliamentary Gold Handicap on the Royal St. George's links at Sandwich on the 11th ult. The field was playing against "Bogey"—an exacting business for the average amateur on a championship green—and Mr. Balfour finished "one down," beating Mr. A. P. Du Cros for first place. Mr. Balfour did not do quite so well as he hoped, for his ambition was to finish at least even on "Colonel Bogey."

THE danger of carrying money in lonely places to pay coolies with has just been again exemplified by a tragic incident in Tonkin. A European named Barnich, accompanied by seven coolies, was on the way to pay labourers, when five of his men suddenly set upon him with knives. After murdering the poor fellow, they rifled the money chest and made off with the cash, about $1,900. None of them had been arrested at the date of last advices.

THE salary of the Rt. Hon. John Burns, President of the Local Government Board, says the S.-C. Morning Post, has been increased from £2,000 to £5,000 a year. The career of Mr. John Burns, one time Hyde Park orator, Trafalgar-square agitator and socialist, observes our Hongkong contemporary, is one that, while reflecting credit on himself, disproves the socialist dogma that all men are equal. A working man, Burns is the author of the famous statement (made in Trafalgar Square) that "no man is worth more than £500 a year." He was then the representative of the turbulent element in the working classes: to-day, a familiar figure at Court, with a salary that assures for him all the amenities of life, he is the calm, clear-sighted statesman who sees the fallacies of "socialism" and recognises that men are not equal.

THE crusade against the brutalising influence of the Jeffries-Johnson fight has now taken shape in a decision to hold revival meetings as a counter attraction to the big battle. Two New York preachers have arranged to visit the scene of the fight and hold meetings, beginning some days beforehand. They are being financed by business men of New York who object to the contest. The Rev. "Billy" Sunday, the baseball evangelist, is one of the preachers.

SCOTLAND last year had the lowest birth, death, and marriage rates ever recorded, says the report of the Registrar-General. The following shows the comparison with England:—

	Scotland.	England.
	1909-1908.	1909-1908.
Birth-rate.....	26.36 27.21	25.58 26.5
Marriage-rate	12.34 13.08	14.55 14.9
Death-rate	15.29 16.13	14.49 14.7

There was an increase in illegitimate births.

THE performances by Professor Max Reinhardt's Company in Budapest and Vienna are now over and have brought both manager and artists the greatest possible triumphs. In Budapest The Taming of the Shrew was the greatest artistic success, but in Vienna Hamlet, with Moissi, awoke the praise of the entire press. At the invitation of the manager of the "World's Fair" Max Reinhardt is giving a series of performances in the Theatre Royal du Parc in Brussels from the 1st to 10th of June.

A PEKING message to the N.-C. Daily News announces that the Throne has refused the memorial recently presented by provincial delegates asking for the speedy summoning of a Parliament. The reply says that it is impossible to shorten the period of nine years fixed by the Emperor Kuang Hsü. The condition of China's finances and the recent riots show that the country is not ripe for a Constitution. The Imperial Assembly, meeting in the ninth moon, would lead to a Parliament. The reply concludes:—"Let not the request be repeated."

DUKE AND DUCHESS ALBRECHT, of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, arrived in Kobe on the 4th inst. at 11.14 a.m. Their Highnesses visited the Deutsche-Asiatische Bank and attended a luncheon at the Club Concordia given in their honour by the German residents of Kobe. One pretty feature of the visit, says the Herald, was the presentation of a beautiful bouquet to the Duchess by four young girls—Misses Hasche, Westphalen, Thiel and Oldenburg. In the afternoon Their Highnesses embarked on board the O.S.K. steamer Tetsurei Maru, which left for Dairen at 4 p.m.

THE transportation of cocoons by railway has been going on since the 1st of June. At first, comparatively small quantities were sent forward, but since about the middle of last month the parcels have gradually increased and on the 30th June the number of cars used in the work, including those on the Usui pass and Sasago pass, reached 2,564. The former pass connects Shinano and Kadzusa provinces, and the latter Kai province, which are the principal silk districts. This is an increase of 182 cars as compared with last year, when the cocoon business was most prosperous.

The Toyo S.S. Company held a meeting of directors on Thursday to discuss various financial problems, especially the means of disbursement for shipbuilding at the Mitsubishi Dockyard. Baron Shibusawa and Mr. Toyokawa were also present. It was decided that a call of 7.50 yen should be made on the 130,000 new shares, which sum comes to 975,000 yen in all. But, on the other hand, as the Company has continually sustained losses, the new call may embarrass the shareholders, so that it was also decided to hold on the 4th inst. a meeting of those shareholders who possess over 500 shares, to explain to them the reason why the new installment is necessary.

ITCHING ECZEMA WAS INTOLERABLE

Eruption Spread Over Face and Body—Shamefully Disfigured—
Had to Tie Hands and Feet and Bandage Face to Stop Agonized
Scratching—Even Specialists

THOUGHT IT INCURABLE
BUT CUTICURA CURED HER

"Some three years ago I suffered from a slight rash which grew gradually to such a pitch that it developed into weeping eczema. So bad was I, the disease spreading over my face and whole body, that I would only go out wearing a veil so extremely thick that my features were unrecognizable and I myself could hardly see. In addition to this, every night, on account of the terrible itching and sores, my hands had to be bound up and then tightly tied behind my back and as even then so intolerable was the agony that I would scratch where possible with my feet and rub my face against the bed clothes; my parents had eventually to firmly tie my feet together and bind a silk handkerchief all over my face.

"I mention these facts with reluctance but they show the condition to which I was reduced. This went on for nearly two years in spite of specialists and treatments at two hospitals, but all gave me up as incurable. I was then advised to try Cuticura and, being desperate, did so. I slept better the first night, and persevering, the itching gradually grew less, and the sores disappeared. Now I am free from blemish, rid of the irksome bandages and can dispense with a veil. My cure is so wonderful and complete that I feel I should like others to know of this and, though you will quite appreciate from the above facts my not disclosing my name, I hope that you will see fit to publish this letter for the benefit of others. I am now only twenty, so you will understand what my cure means to me. L—y G—m, Grand Parade, Eastbourne, Eng., Aug. 27, 1909."

Cuticura is the most economical treatment known for the skin, scalp, hair and hands, of infants, children and adults. YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, JULY 16TH, 1910.

DEATH.

SUTHERLAND.--At Toronto, Canada, The Reverend ALEXANDER SUTHERLAND, D.D., Foreign Secretary of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Church, Canada. (By cable.)

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

A SEVERE rainstorm is reported to have raged recently in Ishikawa prefecture, in consequence of which the rivers in that prefecture are rising to an alarming extent.

THE KING has intimated that he will give a cup, as did King Edward, for a race for Royal Yacht Squadron yachts during the forthcoming Cowes week, which opens on August 1.

MESSRS. OGAWA, Itakura, Muto, and Suzuki, Japanese M.P.s., who are now in Paris on their way to the International Parliamentary Conference, are reported to have been entertained on Monday at a banquet by President Fallières.

ACCORDING to a telegram from Mr. Wada, Commissioner-General of the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition, Baron Oura, accompanied by Ambassador Kato, was received in audience by the King on the 5th instant. In the evening His Excellency gave a dinner at the Hotel Cecil, entertaining over 150 Japanese. The next morning the Baron inspected the Exhibition and was entertained at luncheon by the Royal Botanical Society. Subsequently His Excellency attended a reception given by Japanese residents.

THE graduation ceremony of the Sapporo Agricultural College was held on Friday. Mr. Okada, Vice-Minister of Education, attended the function. Three superior graduates received silver watches sent as prizes by His Majesty the Emperor.

THE Railway Board has published in Japanese an elaborate brochure called the "Excursion Guide Book." The book contains illustrations of almost all the noted places in Japan, with detailed explanations as to their history, geography, climate, products, etc.

THE receipts of the Government railways during June last amounted to 3,160,473 yen for passengers and 3,193,559 yen for freights. These figures show an increase of 201,285 yen for the former and 164,048 yen for the latter, compared with the corresponding month of last year.

HIS MAJESTY KING GEORGE made his appearance in Rotten Row yesterday morning, says a despatch of June 29th to the S.-C. Morning Post. It was his first appearance there since he came to the throne. His Majesty, who was respectfully greeted by the many present, greatly enjoyed his ride.

A FUSAN despatch states that owing to an inundation, the bridge between Waikwan and Shinto, on the Seoul-Fusan railway, was washed away, and in consequence traffic has been suspended since the morning of the 9th. The line will be reopened in two or three days. Traffic on the Masan line has been suspended also.

THE requests for the earlier opening of a parliament having been rejected, rumours are prevalent in Peking of the likelihood of attempts being made to assassinate the Ministers. In consequence, the residences of the various Ministers of State are now being strictly guarded by soldiers. There is said to be much uneasiness in the city.

THE Department of Communications has decided to convert the present system of telegraphic and telephonic wires into an underground one. The electric light wires are also to be put underground, and investigation is already being undertaken for the purpose. The latter conversion is said to result in even greater economy than in the two former cases.

AN interport polo tournament has just been held in Shanghai, teams from Tsingtau and Hongkong meeting a Shanghai team. Tsingtau turned out a weak side and suffered defeat at the hands of the other two teams. Hongkong took the honours, beating Shanghai by 3—1 and Tsingtau by 9—2. The match between Shanghai and Tsingtau resulted in a win for the former by 12—0.

MR. IMANISHI, of the Yokohama Silk Conditioning House, is quoted as saying that the raw silk production of Japan increases every year by about 20,000 bales. In spite of the small crop this year, an increase of more than 10,000 bales as against last year is expected. As a result of the progress in the weaving industry in the United States, Japanese silks are used for the woof instead of the warp, so that the Japanese are compelled to manufacture thick articles. This has no doubt retarded the progress of the silk industry in Japan. The Japanese silk products can stand in rivalry only against the Chinese products, and are by far inferior to the Italian articles. This is by no means an agreeable fact for the Japanese to face. Endeavours must be made to improve the Japanese product so that it can compete with the Italian, a thing which it is not altogether impossible to accomplish.

It is reported from Osaka that a few days ago some stock speculators in that city attempted a movement to reduce the rate of electric light charges for the purpose of effecting a sudden decline in the shares of the Osaka Electric Light Company. Their intentions were immediately laid bare. If, however, the movement were advocated by disinterested persons, it would be welcomed by the public.

THE Pyongyang branch of the Bank of Korea purchased during last month gold in the lump worth 219,014.41 yen. This, says the Seoul Press, shows an increase of 126,265.41 yen compared with the returns for the corresponding month of last year. The recent increase in the output of the precious metal from the mines at Sakju and Changsong is stated to be the chief cause of the remarkable growth of the business done by the branch in this line.

MR. DICKINSON, the U.S. Secretary of War, who is expected to visit Japan with Mrs. Dickinson and several others, will arrive at Yokohama on the 14th instant by the steamer Siberia. General Oku, Chief of the General Staff, will presumably represent the Japanese army, as Viscount Terauchi, Minister of War, is leaving for Korea. On the Secretary's arrival in Tokyo, he will be entertained at the Koraku-en in Koishikawa, as was President Taft, the then Secretary of War, during his visit to Japan three years ago.

A TSURUGA despatch says that the International Sleeping Car and Express Trains Company and the East China Railway Company have arrived at an agreement that during ten years commencing on the 1st July (of the Julian calendar), 1910, the Sleeping Car Company shall make use of the Railway Company's carriages and wagons (twelve each of the first-class and second-class carriages, a dining-car, and five wagons), and that the changing of trains shall be conducted at Irkutsk. The connection with the Japanese railways being settled, through tickets will be issued on and after the 1st July (of the Julian calendar) this year at the principal stations in Japan.

MANY here and at other open ports of the country will regret very much to hear that Mr. Wm. Kerr, an old and esteemed resident of this port, writes the Kobe Herald, and for many years one of our most successful athletes, is lying seriously ill in the Sano Hospital, whither he was removed from his residence two days ago in order to undergo a surgical operation. This was successfully performed on Thursday afternoon by Dr. Paravicini (who kindly came down from Yokohama for the purpose) and Dr. Huston, with the assistance of Dr. Sano. Owing to the patient's low state of health—he has been suffering for some weeks—the operation, which was a serious and complicated one, had to be performed without administering an anæsthetic, but our readers will be glad to learn that Mr. Kerr bore it well, despite the excruciating pain. The trouble, we understand, is peritonitis, aggravated by other complications. The patient is progressing favourably and every one hopes that he will soon be able to resume his customary place in the community, but at the same time there is still much cause for anxiety.

THE NEW CONVENTION.

Friday, July 8.

On the 7th inst. the new convention is said to have been debated and approved by the Privy Council, and the present expectation is that it will be promulgated on the 13th inst. It is stated that the meeting of the Privy Council took place in the Palace, and that detailed explanations were given by the Prime Minister and the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Manchester Guardian, a great Liberal organ, is telegraphed as stating that the new convention is directed against America and that it cannot be placed in the same category with the Anglo-Japanese alliance. The Standard, on the other hand, which, as everybody knows, is a conservative organ, regards the convention as directed against Chinese aspirations. The Times welcomes the convention as a fresh contribution to the peace of the world.

Among Japanese leading journals the Mainichi Dempo takes somewhat the same line as the Manchester Guardian. It says in effect that the convention was precipitated, if not inspired, by the action of Mr. Secretary Knox in proposing to neutralize the railways in Manchuria. That measure had the effect of showing both countries that their interests in the Three Eastern Provinces are virtually identical, and thus an unpremeditated bond was drawn between them.

The Nippon, from which perhaps some chauvinistic opinion might have been anticipated, writes on the contrary in a very moderate strain. It says that the convention is to be heartily welcomed as giving unequivocal expression to views already held by the two nations. There had been at one time talk of a war of revenge, but people obsessed by that fear forgot the magnitude of the Russian Empire and the fact that the Far East constitutes for Russia only one of several problems with which she has to deal. It was not at all likely that she would disturb the equilibrium of her policy by concentrating all her force at one point. From that aspect the new convention is a work of supererogation, but nevertheless it is heartily welcome as giving a definite expression to the two Empires' community of ideas and identity of interests. It will be observed that this article makes no reference to the American aspect of the problem.

Saturday, July 9.

According to the Jiji Shimpō's London telegrams the Novoe Vremya is very outspoken in discussing the new Russo-Japanese Convention. It describes the document as a new factor for the preservation of peace, and as a guarantee that no outside Power shall be allowed to interfere with Japanese and Russian interests in Far-Eastern Asia. The St. Petersburg journal further states that the entente will enable the high contracting parties to reduce their excessive armaments, and will promote Russia's plans for the construction of the Amur Railway and the colonization of Siberia. The Novoe Vremya goes on to say quite frankly that Mr. Secretary Knox's neutralization proposals are more or less responsible for the Convention. The United States Government, having obtained Japan's theoretical assent to the building of the Chinchow-Aigun Railway, placed Russia in an embarrassing situation from which she now emerges happily.

A brief telegram is published by Tokyo journals to the effect that the French press unanimously adopts, towards the Convention, an attitude of welcome and of approval.

The Mainichi Dempo has a telegram from Vienna which says that the Austrian press regards the Convention as an event of great international importance. It will be followed, these journals think, by the incorporation of Korea in the Japanese Empire, and it will free Russia's hand in the Far East, so that she will be able to exert her influence fully in European politics.

The opinion of the Seiyū-kai, as interpreted by the Mainichi Dempo, is that the Convention assures the continuance of the status quo in Manchuria, and guarantees the interests of the contracting parties against any arbitrary interference on the part of a third Power. From China's point of view, the Convention presents no objectionable feature whatever, since it may be regarded as a further guarantee of the integrity of Manchuria. In fact, the opinion of Japan's great political party, if it be rightly interpreted by our contemporary, is that the new Convention should be welcomed by all countries as consolidating the basis of international peace, and as ensuring to the world an uninterrupted use of the Trans-Asian Railway.

Even the London Times does not hesitate to say that the action taken by Mr. Secretary Knox was indirectly responsible for the negotiation of this Convention, since it demonstrated to Russia and Japan that an agreement between themselves would be less objectionable than the inclusion of the railway question in the domain of diplomacy. For the rest, the Times has only good words for the Convention.

Sunday, July 10.

The telegraphic wires are busy transmitting the views expressed by various newspapers with regard to the new Convention, but these opinions lose much of their interest when we remember that the contents of the Convention have not yet been published. The North China Daily News is quoted as saying that the Convention certainly precludes the incorporation of Korea into the Japanese Empire, and our contemporary doubts whether Japan has gone the best way to work in that matter for she certainly has not won the good will of the Koreans, which is essential to successful amalgamation. The Shanghai paper then passes on to what may be called the real gist of its article, namely, a speculation as to whether China's eyes are yet opened. Does the Middle Kingdom recognize that Manchuria is practically lost to it, and that the shread of sovereignty which remains is a very slender affair? China has not played her cards well. There was one friend whose coöperation she might easily have won had she shown herself more trusting and more conciliatory. But her chance is now past and she has only herself to depend on.

The Shanghai Times writes in very strong terms. It declares that this Convention completes the ruin of the edifice of equal opportunity and preservation of China's integrity. In fact, nothing could be graver from the point of view of China's interests. But whether she recognizes the situation fully may be doubted.

The Shanghai Mercury does not speak editorially. It confines itself to publishing a letter over the signature of "Common Sense." The writer opines that the conclusion of the Convention is a calamity for China, since it assigns Northern Manchuria to Russia and Southern to Japan.

The first Chinese newspaper to comment on the Convention is the Hsinwen-pao of Shanghai. Its article is a threnody. It says that all the efforts made by China to improve Manchuria, to educate the people and to organize a military force, have ended in complete failure. Every one of the negotiations undertaken by the Peking Government with regard to administrative authority, mines, railways, lumber industry and the navigation of the Sungari, have all encountered diplomatic defeat, and this too before the completion of the new Convention. Japan, though a little island State in the remote East, has engaged in a victorious war with one of the great countries of the West, and thereafter by clever diplomacy has concluded ententes and alliances which place her to-day in the front rank of the world's Powers. On the other hand, China, which in point of population and extent stands second to no other State, has fallen into a wholly negligible situation, and is now compelled to sit idly by while two foreign Powers discuss the ownership of her territories.

The Asahi Shimbun's Peking correspondent says that the effect which the conclusion of the Convention has had upon China may be judged from the fact that the Waiwupu has resolved to settle all outstanding questions with Russia.

The Mainichi Dempo's Peking correspondent writes that all the foreign diplomats in that city consider that the Convention is proximately due to the proposals made by the United State Secretary of State, but inasmuch as the correspondent then proceeds to show that all the responsible foreign diplomats are absent from Peking, one is perplexed to discover where he obtained his information. He goes on to say that the attitude of China towards Japan and Russia has been materially affected by the signature of the Convention, but even here we are unable to follow him, for the proof he adduces is the welcome accorded by the Viceroy in Mukden to the Japanese Governor-General of the Leased Territory, an event which preceded by several days the signature of the Convention. In fact, it seem to us that the public has fallen into one of its periodical fits of excitement, and that when it calms down, this new Convention will assume a new character.

From Berlin come two opinions that reach us via London and are telegraphed by the Mainichi Dempo's correspondent. One is attributed to a leading German journalist. He says that the new Convention will impair the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. The other emanates from a German Naval Authority. He predicts that war between America and Japan is inevitable, and that when it breaks out the Anglo-Japanese alliance will become a dead letter.

Monday, July 11.

New York telegraphs to the Asahi Shimbun that the prevalent opinion in the United States is hostile to the new Russo-Japanese Convention. It is frankly admitted that the contents of the document are not known, but none the less people are disposed to consider that the interests of the United States are compromised. The obvious rejoinder that to condemn a document without knowing its contents can not be regarded as an act of reason, is met by the suggestion that there is a secret treaty appended. Of course if such hypotheses be admitted, an illimitable field is opened for criticism. Mr. Secretary Knox is quoted as saying that he has not yet learned the terms of the Convention, but that if he finds it in any way opposed to the principle of the Open Door and Equal Opportunities, he will oppose it vigorously. We do not believe that Mr. Knox has said anything of the kind, for the simple reason that he must be well acquainted with the exact terms of the Convention. In view of the peculiar mood of that small section of the United States agitators who may not inaptly be termed "Hobsonites," we must be prepared for no little froth and foam, but there is always the solid good sense of the American nation to fall back on.

Tuesday, July 12.

It is stated that on the 11th inst. the Russian and the Japanese representatives in Peking proceeded to the Waiwupu and formally communicated the contents of the new Convention.

As for the promulgation in Japan, it is expected to take place at 1 o'clock to-day.

The Nippon publishes a somewhat mysterious telegram embodying an appreciation of the attitude of the various Powers towards the new Convention. The sender of the telegram interprets France as welcoming the Convention because it frees Russia's hand in the near East, and represents England also as friendly to the arrangement. He declares, however, that German journals are writing in a strain calculated to sow ill-will between Japan and the United States of America, by representing that the Convention is directed chiefly against the latter. The Americans themselves are keeping comparatively quiet, doubtless because they are without exact information as to the contents of the Convention. Finally this analyst says that China finds herself confronted by two strong enemies and is not a little perturbed.

Another telegram published by all the Japanese newspapers says that France is treating the German comments with sang froid and that, undoubtedly, the Convention has improved Japan's position in French eyes.

It need scarcely be said that some of the Japanese journals of Tokyo devote space in their leading columns to a discussion of the Convention, but as none of them is yet in possession of the text, the only interesting feature of their comments is that they are unanimous in believing that the Convention, so far from impairing, will materially confirm the policy of the Open Door and Equal Opportunity. In fact they hold that such a Convention is nothing more than a demonstration of Russo-Japanese friendship, and that it will not in any way injure the interests of other Powers.

Wednesday, July 13.

Accounts are conflicting with regard to China's attitude towards the new Convention. A telegram to the Jiji Shimpō says that at a meeting of the Council of State held to consider the matter, very divergent views were expressed, but the upshot of the conference was a decision to make a strong representation to Japan, in a sense adverse to the Convention. We believe this to be a sensational telegram without any basis of fact.

The Peking Daily News, a journal which is supposed to have strong American connections, attacks the Convention uncompromisingly; declares that it is a direct answer to the Knox proposals, and frankly expresses the conviction that Russia and Japan have joined hands for the exclusion of all other Powers from Manchuria.

With the above two exceptions, China's attitude towards the Convention is said to be calm. At all events the Chinese are sensible enough to wait for the official publication of the document before commenting on its unknown contents.

Another telegram to the Jiji Shimpō from Peking is to the effect that the Convention has at length roused China to a sense of the necessity of protecting her northern frontiers. In this matter, if the telegram be credible, Germany is to be the tertium gaudens. Officers have been despatched to Berlin for the purpose of purchasing 10,000 stands of small-arms which will be at once placed in the hands of the Ili troops, and it is further alleged that arrangements have been made for procuring 30 German field-guns. We give this rumour for what it may be worth.

THE NEW RUSSO-JAPANESE CONVENTION.

(OFFICIAL TEXT.)

The Governments of Japan and Russia, in their sincere wish to strengthen the relations of amity and good neighbourhood between the two States and to ensure lasting peace and stability in the Extreme East, recently entered into an exchange of views as to the means best suited to the consummation of the desired end. Having in view the actual situation in Manchuria, where the interests of the two Powers meet, they were persuaded of the advisability of harmonizing their actions and co-ordinating their interests in that region, in completion of their Convention of 1907, and were agreed, upon mutual deliberation, to formulate an accord in the sense indicated. That accord is embodied in the new Convention just signed at St. Petersburg. The present Convention, having for its object the maintenance of the status quo in Manchuria and the consolidation of general peace in the Far East, serves simply to confirm the principles recognized by the last Convention and to complete the provisions of that arrangement.

CONVENTION BETWEEN JAPAN AND RUSSIA,
SIGNED AT ST. PETERSBURG ON JULY 4, 1910.

The Imperial Government of Japan and the Imperial Government of Russia, sincerely attached to the principles established by the Convention concluded between them on the 30/17 July, 1907, and desirous to develop the effects of that Convention with a view to the consolidation of peace in the Extreme East, have agreed to complete the said Arrangement by the following provisions:—

Article I.—With the object of facilitating communications and developing the commerce of nations, the two High Contracting Parties mutually engage to lend to each other their friendly co-operation with a view to the amelioration of their respective railway lines in Manchuria and the improvement of the connecting service of the said railways, and to abstain from all competition prejudicial to the realization of this object.

Article II. Each of the High Contracting Parties engages to maintain and respect the status quo in Manchuria resulting from the treaties, conventions and other arrangements concluded up to this day, between Japan and Russia, or between either of those two Powers and China. Copies of the aforesaid arrangements have been exchanged between Japan and Russia.

Article III. In case any event arises of a nature to menace the status quo above mentioned, the two High Contracting Parties shall, in each case, enter into communication with each other, in order to arrive at an understanding as to the measures they may judge it necessary to take for the maintenance of the said status quo.

In witness whereof, the Undersigned, duly authorized by their respective Governments, have signed this Convention and have affixed thereto their seals.

DISTURBANCES IN SHANTUNG.

Ever since 1899 the province of Shantung has had an evil reputation on account of the Boxer disturbances, and people are therefore disposed to attach special importance to any symptoms of unrest which show themselves there. Perhaps therefore undue weight is given by the telegraph to an insurrection which is said to have taken place at Taiyang. It is nevertheless significant that the Governor of the province has thought necessary to despatch 2,000 troops to the scene, and that the German Authorities have sent a gun-boat to Haiyang, which is the nearest accessible point of the disturbed region. Moreover Chinese soldiers are being carried by the German Railway to Chingyang in the neutral zone, and all these measures indicate that something greatly out of the common is on foot.

One explanation given of the trouble is that it has its origin in that perennial source of Chinese disturbance, namely crop failure. The harvest in Shantung this season is said to be exceptionally bad, and in view of pending distress the Authorities are making preparations to deal with probable disturbances. Some time ago the Governor formed a plan for giving relief by employing a number of workmen on the embankment of the Yellow river. He asked Peking for a grant of 700,000 taels to devote to this work, but Peking declined to comply, and ordered the Governor to procure the necessary funds locally. An attempt to do this has only added fuel to the fire, and altogether the situation is very unsatisfactory.

THE OPIUM QUESTION.

Mr. Consul-General Jamieson is said to have addressed a very strong despatch to the Viceroy in Canton. He points out that whereas Great Britain has evinced sincere and practical sympathy with China's anti-opium crusade, and has voluntarily assisted to put an end to the vice, China has responded by deliberately ignoring the terms of the Chefoo question, and by subjecting imported opium to a tax which would have the effect of altogether upsetting the arrangement concluded between the Governments. If the Viceroy persists in this course, Great Britain will be obliged to demand a modification of her recent agreement with China, and the Consul General concludes by saying that the whole responsibility for the complication will rest on the head of the Chinese.

Even those who are heartily at one with China's efforts to eradicate the opium vice must admit that she is not showing good faith in the present phase of the programme. England has made great sacrifices to assist the reform. She has gone as far as any one could easily have expected, and indeed much further than many people anticipated. But the Chinese Authorities seem to be now bent upon taking the law into their own hands and subjecting English tradesmen to intolerable losses.

CHINA.

Friday, July 8.

Great numbers of destitute Chinese subjects appear to be emigrating from the provinces of Hupeh and Hunan, and no less than 4,000 are said to have arrived within the last few days at Yingkow. They have no visible means of sustenance, and it would seem that they have merely migrated with a vague hope of finding food and shelter somewhere in Manchuria. Of course there is no employment for them in Yingkow, and they thus become objects of solicitude to the local authorities, since in the desperation induced by want of the necessities of life, they may at any moment resort to violence. By the Viceroy's order some hundreds of these immigrants have been sent eastward to the Amur province where a measure of work is obtainable, but the finances of the Amur province are already strained beyond the limits of their elasticity, and this resource is wholly inadequate to meet the needs of the situation, which is therefore causing some uneasiness. The Viceroy is said to have issued instructions that all except able-bodied labourers shall be returned forthwith to their native provinces, but it is evident that this method of procedure may augment the hardship by separating the feeble members of families from their bread-winners. China certainly has some difficult problems to solve.

The province of Shantung has been from time immemorial a great breeding ground of cattle, which are exported thence in considerable numbers to Manchuria and especially to Siberia. Recently, however, the Governor of the province suddenly issued an order vetoing any further export, and of course great consternation was caused among the cattle-breeders. The Russian authorities immediately entered a protest, and the action of the Governor is now under consideration in Peking. No satisfactory reason is assigned for such a mandate, but the Kiaochow Authorities are said to be inclined to think that the Governor's veto was preliminary to the imposition of a tax on the export of cattle and is thus merely a device for obtaining increased revenue.

It would seem that the reports recently circulated as to a speedy settlement of the Fushun question were at least premature. The claims advanced on behalf of Mr. Wang are still strongly pressed by the Chinese. These claims represent a sum of 220,000 taels, which though not a large amount considering the value of the property concerned, is quite enough to justify careful investigations. Then there is still a dispute about the limits of the concession, and about the royalty to be paid by the concessionaires, and it is further apprehended that the Chinese will press to have the Japanese police and gendarmes withdrawn altogether from the region. This analysis of the situation is furnished by the Mainichi Shimbun's Mukden correspondent, and if it be accurate, it would go to show that a great deal remains to be settled.

For some time past there have been rumours of a considerable movement of Korean emigrants from the north-west of the Peninsula to the region of Chanpei-shan, for the purpose of settling there, which of course entails the assumption of Chinese nationality. These rumours are now confirmed, and it is added that the movement has assumed sufficient dimensions to induce the Viceroy of Manchuria to make it a subject of special inquiry. No explanation is given as to the motives which induce Korean subjects to take that step, but the conjecture is that life and property is so insecure in Korea, owing to the acts of insurgents and brigands, that the unfortunate inhabitants are emigrating as a last resource. That may be true, of course, but there is a difficulty in accepting such an explanation at this eleventh hour when the outrages of the insurgents and the bandits have been palpably checked. In fact there has not been any season during the past 5 years so free from disturbance in the Peninsula as the present is.

Saturday, July 9.

The Shanghai vernacular journal Shipao publishes a telegram from Kweiling, capital of the province Kwangsi. The message says that in connection with local taxation, severe riots have occurred at Annang, Wuchow and Linchow in that province. The fighting is said to have continued for several days and nights, the rioters being armed with rifles, and boldly opposing the military. Quiet seems to have been restored with difficulty and at the expense of 30 or 40 killed and 160 wounded. The telegraph wires were cut at one time but communication seems to have been quickly restored.

During the night of the 7th inst. a conflagration occurred in the Japanese section of the Nanking Exhibition. No very serious damage seems to have been done, but a few of the exhibits were destroyed. The fire is said to have had its origin in defective electric lighting apparatus, and more injuries were done by the water used to extinguish the flames than by the flames themselves. It is feared, however, that the Japanese section of the Exhibition will have to be closed for a period of 3 weeks.

The attempt to enforce the new currency system in China is leading to some trouble. With the issue of the Government's convertible notes the circulation of credit bills by private places of business has been interdicted. This has naturally caused great dissatisfaction and loss to the folks by whom these bills had hitherto been put into circulation, and they are holding meetings in Peking to consider some remedial measure. At present the outcome of their consultation is said to be that a vehemently worded circular will be despatched throughout the provinces, calling upon all those interested to unite in opposing the official veto. It is of course impossible that the issue of inconvertible notes by private individuals or firms should be permitted side by side with the circulation of official convertible paper, but nobody imagined that China's recently inaugurated currency reforms would be carried to completion without some embarrassment.

There is a somewhat disquieting telegram from Peking to the effect that since the 7th inst. extraordinary precautions have been adopted to guard the residences of the Prince Regent and of the members of the Council of State. This measure is believed to have been dictated by the sequel of the Government's refusal to entertain the petition for the immediate opening of a national assembly, but some accounts speak of an insurrection in Hsishan which is causing uneasiness.

Sunday, July 10.

From several quarters comes news of a somewhat formidable insurrection in the Yuankiang region of Hunan, near the great lake. Two battalions of troops were despatched hastily to the scene from Hupeh on the 7th inst., and they are reported to have dispersed the insurgents.

Monday, July 11.

It appears that the Chinese Government is disposed to adopt a very practical course in dealing with the Manchurian problem. Recently a programme was elaborated for transferring a number of able-bodied men from the provinces of Hupeh and Hunan to the three Eastern Provinces, especially the Amur district, and the experiment is said to have been so successful that it is likely to be extended on a very large scale. The transfer of one million immigrants is now spoken of, and the plan for this purpose is under consideration in Peking. But as the expense involved would be at least 20 million dollars, there is naturally some hesitation on the part of the authorities. If such a scheme be carried out in its entirety it will serve as a very practical proof of China's determination to maintain her sway in Manchuria. It is interesting to reflect that while China is busy with a project of this sort, Russia is taking great trouble to populate her Siberian territory, and numbers of Japanese are migrating to the zones of the South Manchuria Railway.

A telegram to the Asahi confirms the news published yesterday as to the attitude assumed by China in the immediate sequel of the Russo-Japanese Convention. Peking is now said to have decided on recognizing the justice of Russia's Sungali claim, and a settlement of the question is confidently anticipated by St. Petersburg. In speaking thus we do not mean to suggest that we ourselves connect this placable mood on China's part with the Convention. We merely place on record an opinion which seems to prevail.

It is stated that a high Russian officer, whose telegraphed name we cannot decipher, has just commenced a tour throughout Manchuria for the purpose of erecting some in-memoriam tablets to the officers and men who fell in the war, and whose remains are now lying buried in unrecorded places.

There seems to be an alarm in Peking about the importation of bombs from Japan. The Hochi Shimbun is said to be responsible for this alarm. It recently published a statement to the effect that members of the revolutionary party were buying bombs in Japan and sending them to Peking. Regarding this intelligence to be trustworthy, the Chinese Authorities are taking steps to strictly scrutinize all the machinery of communications, and to guard the residences of high officials in the capital.

It does not appear that there is any probability of the completion of the building for the accommodation of the Tsucheng-yuan during the course of the present year. Plans of the proposed building have been drawn and approved, but as only five months remain in 1910, it is evident that this body, whose assembly is regarded with so much interest, will have to hold its first meeting in a temporary edifice.

Another source of alarm has arisen in Peking. On the 9th inst. the examination of provincial students commenced in the capital. There are 5,000 of these students, and the examination will last for seven days. Among the youths many are said to sympathise strongly with the applicants for an immediate national assembly, and it is apprehended that the latter may contrive some new striking form of demonstration by utilizing this material.

The disturbance at Yuanjiang in Hunan does not seem to be quelled by any means. A further force of troops has been sent to the place from Hupeh. The reason for selecting Hupeh soldiers, instead of utilizing the Hunan troops is said to be that the Governor cannot rely on the latter to deal strongly with their own provincials.

We gather from a statement attributed to a Japanese subject who has just returned from Canton that in dispensing with the services of a number of Japanese experts engaged for the purposes of the Yeh-Han Railway, the Railway Authorities did not intend to reflect in any way upon the competence on conduct of these experts. The difficulty was merely one of funds.

Tuesday, July 12.

A somewhat perplexing telegram reaches the Nichi Nichi Shimbun from Peking. It sets out by saying that although there are some 40 or 50 millions of Mohammedans in China, no treaty exists between that country and Turkey. Formerly, these followers of Mohammed were under French protection, but in 1908 Germany informed the Waiwupu that she had been asked by the Porte to safeguard the interests of all Mohammedans within the confines of the Chinese Empire. The Chinese Government, however—so, at least, the telegram says—took no notice of this announcement and continued to treat the Mohammedans as subjects of a non-treaty Power. Recently, Turkey began to move in this matter, and is said to have commissioned the Italian representative in Peking to open negotiations for the conclusion of a treaty.

The Kiaochou correspondent of the Shanghai German journal telegraphs that the insurrection in Laiyang is assuming serious dimensions. The insurgents have established a connection with the bandits in Manchuria, and are armed with modern rifles. The character of the rising is not anti-foreign. It is directed against the bureaucracy and the aristocracy. Whether this bears any relation to the agitation in Peking, which is said to be fomented by Shantung students, there is nothing to show.

A telegram to the Mainichi Dempo from Peking says that there has been another attempt to break into the palace in that city. On this last occasion the culprit succeeded in getting through all the gates, and reached the immediate precincts of the Empress Dowager's apartments, where he was arrested. It is asserted that he is out of his mind, and nothing is stated as to his having been in possession of a weapon of any kind.

An evil fate seems to have taken charge of the Nanking Exhibition. The telegraph wires had scarcely concluded their account of the conflagration when they were called upon to transmit the news of a thunderstorm which is said to have caused great damage, especially to the American and Zoological sections.

Wednesday, July 13.

It is stated that the man who on the 9th inst. was found in the inner precincts of the Palace at Peking is a member of the corps of guards. That of course would largely account for his success in getting through the gates of the Palace, but such is not the view taken by the Authorities, for they have dismissed all the guards who were on duty and have handed them over to the Board of Punishments. Considering how short a time had elapsed between the occurrence of this incident and the discovery of a man carrying a pistol and prowling about the precincts of the Palace, it is not surprising to hear that a sense of uneasiness has been created in Peking, and that exceptional precautions are being adopted for the protection of the Prince Regent.

The latest rumour in Peking is concerned with the Prince Regent's health. A few days ago he was said to be quite seriously ill, but inasmuch as he gives daily audience to the Ministers of States, it does not appear that his malady can be very grave.

The losses incurred by the recent fire at the Nanking Exhibition were trifling. They did not exceed 4,500 yen, and only a few exhibitors were affected to the extent of over 100 yen. A claim for compensation has been put in but nothing is said about insurance. The storm on the 10th inst. proved a much more serious source of injury than the conflagration. A special pavilion, built by the Manchurian merchants, was levelled by the force of the wind and no less than 6 persons lost their lives. We presume that they were Chinese, but their nationality is not stated.

As to the Chinese Government's plan for relieving the distress in the Yangtze provinces by encouraging emigration to Manchuria, we read in a telegram to the Asahi Shimbun from Mukden that the first batch of 500 emigrants from Hupeh arrived at Yingkow on the 11th inst. and proceeded at once to Mukden by train. Special facilities were given by the railway authorities. The party is said to have included many old people, women and children, whose struggles to procure food are described as pathetic. These emigrants are to proceed direct to the Amur region, but grave doubts seem to be entertained as to whether they will find any means of sustenance there.

The mounted bandits seem to be very busy in the upper reaches of the Yalu River, and the Viceroy of Manchuria has despatched a strong force to deal with this perpetual plague.

Rumour says that the Russian Government contemplates a complete reorganization of its Far Eastern civil service, and that a series of important questions have been submitted to local authorities throughout Siberia and the Maritime Province. Among other things special arrangements will be made for the education of officials destined to serve in East Asia; the present Consulate at Dairen will be changed into a Consulate-General, and steps will be taken without delay to have the Russian flag shown on the Sungali River.

THE JINJU INSURANCE COMPANY.

Saturday, July 9.

The affairs of this Company seem likely to furnish first material for the application of the new criminal code in the matter of misappropriation of trust money. Our readers are aware that the Company's business has been in a confused condition for some time, but the facts are published only now. It appears that one of the directors, Mr. Tojo, some time ago lent to the Japan Warehouse Company a sum of 50,000 yen without any security, the representative of the Warehouse Co. being Mr. Matsutani, who is now known in Tokyo under the historical name of Tenichibo, and who figured as the principal cause of the recent commotion in the Rice Exchange. This advance of 50,000 yen gradually rose to 140,000, by what means it is not yet explained. The fact that the money had been lent to the Warehouse Co. without any security came to light in connection with the Rice-Exchange troubles, and the director, Mr. Tojo, by whom the accommodation had been given, was obliged to resign. It then fell to his fellow director, Mr. Chogo, to collect the money, but his method of doing it was splendidly fraudulent. He advanced no less than 500,000 yen of the Insurance Co.'s money to the Warehouse Co., and out of that sum he deducted the 140,000 due to the Insurance Co., thus recovering 140,000 yen in theory and paying out 500,000 yen in fact. When this came to light Mr. Yamaguchi, a director of the Insurance Co. who represented the honest party, preferred a charge of fraud against Mr. Chogo, who has been arrested. Mr. Matsutani is still at large, but his house has been searched by the police, and it is believed that his arrest will soon follow.

Sunday, July 10.

Since the above was written Mr. Matsutani has been placed under arrest. He attempted to secure a vote of want of confidence at a directors' meeting in Mr. Yamaguchi, who represents the Baron-Tsuji section of the Company, but the motion failed to obtain a hearing. Of course this will favourably affect the affairs of the Tokyo Rice Exchange which has been kept in a state of commotion for months back by the machinations of Mr. Matsutani.

Monday, July 11.

Mr. Matsutani has undergone a judicial examination, but apparently the magistrates did not find sufficient warrant for detaining him. He has been released, but his mood is said to be much chastened, and the back of his agitation is broken. It may reasonably be hoped, therefore, that his mischievous influence will no longer be felt either by the Rice Exchange or the Insurance Company.

AERIAL GOODS TRAFFIC.

It could hardly have been expected that the first practical application of the aeroplane to commercial purposes would take place on the frontier of the United States and Mexico. Nevertheless that in effect is what the San Francisco correspondent of the Asahi Shimbun has to relate. He says that experiments have been carried so far as to justify the organization of a group of aerial vessels for the transport of merchandise from Arizona to Mexico and vice versa. The matter is now under discussion by the two Governments concerned, and a treaty is being drafted to cover the fiscal features of the enterprise. Naturally much interest is excited in other countries, and the completion of the treaty is anxiously awaited.

We may mention here that there is another telegram from New York which speaks of a gas-balloon intended to cross the Atlantic from New York to London. The balloon is to be called the America, and it is expected that the journey will occupy from six to ten days. The time fixed for the attempt is the close of the present month. It must indeed be admitted that the conquest of the air has been brought within measurable distance.

KOREA.

Saturday, July 9.

The Korean subjects resident in the United States are agitating against annexation. They are said to be holding meetings and issuing circulars. We note that agitation of this nature has the support of an English local journal in Yokohama, which, with its usual friendship for Japan and its habitual promotion of international amity, endeavours to persuade United States citizens that their trade with Korea will be completely ruined should the Peninsula be included in the Japanese Empire.

It has been decided that the Resident-General, Viscount Terauchi, will leave Shimabashi by the 3.40 p.m. train on the 14th inst., and will proceed to his post in Seoul. The Viscount is to be received in farewell audience by the Emperor on the 12th inst., and a banquet will be given to him and the leading members of his suite at the official residence of the Prime Minister on the evening of that day.

Opinions are divided as to the prospect of speedy annexation. Some publicists hold that the step will be taken almost immediately after Viscount Terauchi's arrival at his post; but others doubt the probability of any such speedy procedure. These latter think that many points have to be carefully considered, among others an outbreak among the Christian converts in the Peninsula, who would probably find themselves supported by a certain Power. In fact, the problem has to be considered from many sides, and Tokyo journals interpret the Cabinet's mood as one of hesitancy.

Sunday, July 10.

a. All accounts from Seoul agree in representing the city as perfectly quiet. Hitherto even comparatively trivial events excited more or less tumult, but in the present occasion not even such important happenings as the transfer of the police power, or the arrival of the new Vice-Resident-General, have quickened the public pulse perceptibly. Whether it is right to infer that the Koreans have now finally acquiesced in the future lying evidently before them, it would probably be premature to judge, though some Japanese correspondents are speaking in that strain.

It is rumoured that the leaders of the Daihan Hyop-hoi have decided to address to the Resident-General a petition asking that constitutional Government should be granted to Korea after amalgamation with the Japanese Empire. Meanwhile various political parties are reported to be holding meetings for the purpose of determining their attitude towards the pending change.

The Residency-General is said to be drafting a law to prevent the organization of petty political parties. The new statute will provide that unless a certain minimum number of affiliates be obtained a party cannot be registered; that a certain sum shall be put up as security and that if at any time the membership should fall below the minimum establishment, then the party shall be de facto dissolved.

There has been very heavy rain in Korea, resulting in floods of considerable dimensions. The Chin River in the Kusan district has flooded over 100,000 acres of arable land, drowning 14 people, and on the Seoul-Fusan Railway there has been a washout which will require two or three days to repair.

The downfall began on the 6th and continued without intermission until the 9th.

Monday, July 11.

The news from Korea, published by the Kokumin Shimbun, continues to be of the most reassuring character. Absolute quiet seems to prevail, although people are not blind to the near contingency of important political changes. It was related, some time ago, as our readers doubtless remember, that a number of Korean students had returned to Seoul from Tokyo and were about to foment an agitation against Japan. But nothing whatever has been heard of these students since their arrival in Korea, and if they really entertained any such design as that attributed to them, they would appear to have abandoned it. The present outlook is that there is more latent discontent among Japanese employees than among Korean politicians, the former being uneasy about their positions.

From a conversation between the Kokumin Shimbun representative and the Vice-Resident-General, Mr. Yamagata, we gather that the latter's impression as to the state of the Prime Minister's health is not at all favourable. He speaks of Mr. Yi as being in a very debilitated condition.

There is certainly no lack of positive opinion about Korean affairs. A Japanese who has just returned from the Peninsula informs the Nichi Nichi Shimbun in the most unequivocal terms that, so far from being opposed to amalgamation, the Koreans are one and all looking forward to it, and their principal apprehension now is that delay may take place. Even the much talked of Yangpan are persuaded that amalgamation would mean in their case the receipt of a substantial block of pension bonds, a prospect which gratifies them greatly. In fact, if this informant be credited, the Korean nation is longing to become an integral part of Japan. Credat Judæus Apella.

Tuesday, July 12.

It is stated that the Residency-General has communicated to the Vladivostok Authorities through the Consul at Chientao a list of the names of Yi Pongyung and his associates, together with the nature of their machinations. Thus, in the event of any commotion, the Russian Authorities will be in position to lay their hands at once upon these disturbers of public peace.

It is alleged that important modifications of the provincial organization are contemplated in Korea. The present 13 provinces will be reduced to 10, and each of the new provinces will be divided into 25 districts.

The Seoul correspondent of the Mainichi Dempo sends a telegram which sounds very apocryphal. It says that the Residency-General has decided to buy up all the Japanese journals published in Korea, and has commenced operations with the Hinode Shimbun. It seems to us quite incredible that any such interminable procedure should be adopted, especially as the Authorities in Seoul have full competence to deal with any journal transgressing against the cause of peace and order. Much more trustworthy appears to be a telegram to the Asahi, which says that the Toyo Nippo has been suspended for publishing libellous personalities.

It is certainly difficult to form a clear opinion about the state of public opinion in Korea. Telegrams reaching Tokyo journals indicate a condition of entire placidity, and even go so far as to suggest that the leaders of the nation are anxious for amalgamation, but side by side with these reassuring declarations we find the following article in the Seoul press of the 9th inst. :—

We think we are right when we sum up the policy pursued by Japan in this country since she took up the protectorate of the peninsula with the phrase: "Iron in the right hand and glove on the left." While on the one hand Japan has suppressed all forms of disorder with an iron hand, on the other she has done all she could under the existing circumstances to give a just and benevolent administration to all peaceful and law-abiding people. We have no doubt that the same policy will be pursued by H. E. Viscount Terauchi, the new Resident-General. It appears to us, however, that the present requires the wielding of an iron hand more than that of a gloved one in order to secure lasting peace and order in this country. There is no lack of evidence to show that an intense dissatisfaction against the new state of things is fermenting at present among a section of Koreans. It is possible that if it be left unchecked, it may culminate in some shocking crime. Now after carefully studying the cause and nature of the dissatisfaction just referred to, we find that it is both foolish and unreasonable. We see that it is entertained by a small group of young Koreans of shallow education as well as by some impoverished yangban. The former are at best dreamers, who, infatuated with empty names, such as independence and liberty, want to run before they have learned to walk. Whether or not their country is in a fit condition to be independent, does not enter into their thought in the least. They simply want independence for their country, and to get rid of Japan's protectorate, entirely regardless of the disastrous consequence that will surely follow if they attain their object. It is from among these sentimental young hot-bloods that An Chungkeuns and Yi Chaimyongs are likely to appear. As for the discontented section of yangban, they have still less reason to be sympathized with. In old days they lived at the expense of the masses, extorting money from them and contributing nothing towards their welfare. The new enlightened regime has deprived them of their means of sustenance, and naturally enough they are bitterly inimical to it. It is these useless parasites of the Korean people who secretly foster the seeds of insurrection.

Now Japan is in this country with the mission of promoting the happiness of the masses. She has not come to Korea in order to please a few hundred silly youngsters or to feed a few hundred titled loafers. It is no fault of hers that these men are discontented because of her failure to satisfy them. Japan will remain placid if these worthies grumble in secret only, but should they try to show their discontent in a concrete and dangerous way, she cannot continue to be inactive. She must remove by all means every obstacle that lies in her way of ameliorating the wretched condition of the Korean masses. In doing this, she must be prepared to sacrifice anybody who ventures to offer obstacles to her work. Japan has hitherto dealt with Korean malcontents in a lenient way. She has learned from experience gained during the last four or five years that there are some people who cannot be converted by conciliatory measures. There is but one way to deal with this sort of people, and that is by stern and relentless measures. The present state of things in this country is analogous to that in Egypt. Speaking to a London audience recently, Mr. Roosevelt said: "In such a situation as yours in Egypt, weakness, timidity and sentimentality may cause even more far-reaching harm than violence and injustice. Of all broken reeds, sentimentality is the most broken reed on which righteousness can lean." It appears to us that the words of the illustrious American statesman furnish excellent material for consideration to all those who are responsible for maintaining peace and order in this country.

Wednesday, July 13.

The Appeal Court in Seoul has rejected the appeals of Yi Chaimyong, the would-be assassin of the Prime Minister, as well as those of his eight accomplices. One of the appeals was withdrawn, namely, that of Kim, who was convicted of a design to assassinate the leader of the Il Ching-hoi; for that crime he had been sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment, and although he appealed in the first instance, he ultimately acquiesced in the justice of the sentence. It is said that when the judgement of the Appeal Court was delivered confirming the death sentence on Yi Chaimyong, the latter again fell into a condition of frenzy, and vehemently shouted that to execute him while the Prime Minister remained alive was flagrant injustice. The members of his family, who were present in the Court, joined in this clamorous protest, and with difficulty some degree of order was restored.

An officer of the S.S. Tategami which has just arrived at Nagasaki from Vladivostock via Chyongjin, reports that the anti-Japanese Koreans in Vladivostock and along the north-eastern frontier are very busy. There is no deficiency of money, and their connexion with the whole country is so well established that they obtain news of all the Resident-General's doings even before it reaches the Vladivostock Authorities. They find most difficulty in obtaining arms, and they are said to be obliged to content themselves in the matter of artillery with some obsolete field-guns, the parts of which they import separately. This informant thinks that in the event of amalgamation there will inevitably be some bloodshed in these northern districts. On the other hand our readers will have observed that according to yesterday's telegrams a detailed list of all these malcontents was recently transmitted from the Residency-General to the Vladivostock Government, with a view to their immediate apprehension in the event of any untoward events.

Mr. Matsui, who has been relieved of his office as Chief of the Police Bureau in Seoul, is quoted as saying that if amalgamation takes place it will be necessary to appoint Koreans, very largely, to administrative posts in their own country. He also dwells upon the necessity of providing employment for the lower orders. The work of road-making in Chhollodo is carried on almost entirely by ex-insurgents. The results are excellent, and there can be no doubt that if this system were extended, the insurrection would gradually become a thing of the past. Another recommendation made by the same authority is that the services of Japanese physicians should be brought within easy reach of a wide circle of the Korean people. The excellent effect produced by this system, when applied on a small scale, furnishes a certain index of what might be achieved by extending it.

The Crown Prince of Korea left Tokyo on the 18th inst. for a summer trip in the provinces of the Sanindō and Sanyodō. On the 12th His Imperial Highness had farewell audience of the Emperor and Empress, from whom he received various presents of articles likely to be useful on the journey. The Prince will be accompanied by Prince Ito and by Dr. Iwai.

The new Resident-General is to leave Tokyo on the 15th inst. for his post. He was received in farewell audience by the Emperor on the 12th inst.

We take the following from the Seoul Press :—

The railway bridge over the Yalu will be an engineering feature on the entire Seoul-New Wiji Line. It measures 3,100 feet in length and will be supported by twelve piers besides the basis on both banks. Having begun work on the Korean bank, six piers have already been completed and two more are now under construction. These two and another will stand in the deepest part of the stream and their construction involves great engineering difficulty. Fortunately the bed of the river generally consists of rocks, and this fact lends great facilities for quick building. Great despatch is apparently being used in the work, on account of the imminent advent of the rainy season which swells the river considerably. The most difficult part of the whole work, however, has nearly been completed, and the remaining part seems to be of a comparatively easy nature. The bases on the banks have also been finished while the two piers in progress are nearing completion. The bridge is to be finished by the end of March of 1912, but as the river is frozen for four months in the year, from December to March, it will be necessary for the work to be finished by the end of November of the previous year. The Authorities concerned are represented as being confident that it will be finished not later than that date.

According to Customs returns the total amount of export and import during June this year was 1,433,150 yen and 3,231,943 yen respectively. Of the articles for export, rice amounted to 277,800 yen in value, beans 150,000 yen and iron to 52,000 yen. During the same month kerosene oil amounting to 221,000 yen in value was imported, hemp cloth 361,000 yen, lumber and board 172,000 yen, raw calico and sheetings 167,000 yen, and miscellaneous articles to the amount of 1,372,000 yen in value.

A JAPANESE HOBSON.

Mr. Takenokoshi Yosaburo, author of "Twenty-five Centuries of Japanese History" and of a book called Nankoku-ki, appears to have modelled himself upon the well-known Capt. Hobson. He is busily preaching the theory that a collision between Japan and the United States of America is inevitable, and that it behoves this country to take immediate steps for augmenting its navy. His last speech on this subject was delivered by Mr. Takenokoshi at a meeting of the Oriental Economic Society held in the Fujimiken on the 7th inst. His general argument was that the natural directions of the tides of American and Japanese expansion are respectively eastward and southward, and that therefore a collision between them is unavoidable. The particular incident which will precipitate the struggle is, in Mr. Takenokoshi's opinion, the rendition of the South Manchuria Railway to China. In a few years more the time fixed for that rendition will arrive, and if Japan hesitates, she will find herself opposed by probably America and Germany. In the face of this obvious menace, it is the height of folly on her part not to set herself at once to develop the strength of the navy. Her modern history has two remarkable pages. One shows that no sooner was the first programme of naval increment fairly under weigh than the war with China occurred, and no sooner was the second programme of naval and military development on the way to completion than the Russo-Japanese struggle broke out. History will probably repeat itself in this matter. The Americans, according to Mr. Takenokoshi's estimate of their character, are disposed not to placate but to provoke a tiger when it makes its appearance. Japan must be ready. Instead of struggling to clear off her national debts with feverish haste, she should devote a portion of the sinking fund to the increase of her navy.

Of course it is inevitable that men of Mr. Takenokoshi's stamp should arise in Japan. Like begets like. As a matter of historical justice we have always to remember that this menace of war came originally from America's side. Nothing of the kind was ever heard from the lips of a Japanese publicist until the United States Yellow Press had been preaching its belligerent propaganda for a considerable time. Nevertheless we are quite prepared to find that Mr. Takenokoshi's utterances will be regarded by a certain class of critics as an unprovoked incentive rather than as a natural rejoinder.

The Hochi Shimbun has a strong editorial about the necessity of officially checking the utterances of Japanese "Hobsons." It refers specially to Mr. Oishi Masami, and by inference to Mr. Takenokoshi, both of whom have advocated naval expansion as essential in view of a possible conflict with the United States. That vicious line of argument was first taken by American citizens, notably by Capt. Hobson, but unfortunately it has found imitators in Japan. If there were indeed any truth in the evil forecast, it would be incumbent on Japan to increase her Navy at any cost. But are there any responsible American statesmen who consider war inevitable, or are there any Japanese who labour under such a delusion? The advocates of naval expansion may possibly welcome this agitation, not that they have any faith in the reality of the alleged danger, but simply because they look to utilize the spectre for their own purposes. No risk of the kind ought to be run for a moment. The Government should put its foot down firmly and suppress all such utterances, just as it would stamp out the virus of an epidemic.

A MEETING OF THE EEL SOCIETY.

The celebrated Unagikai held a meeting at the Nippon Ginko on the evening of the 8th inst. There were twelve present, 9 of the principal business-men acting as hosts, and the guests being Marquis Katsura, Baron Shibusawa and Mr. Odagiri. The conversation naturally turned upon the economic situation in Japan. During the course of the last few months the transactions of the Finance Department have added about 100 million yen to a money market already easy, and a similar amount will be added in the near future. Therefore the continuance of cheap interest may be looked for as a certainty. On the other hand, the only industrial expansion which has taken place of late is in the realms of electric trams, gas, and hydro-electricity. There has been no general movement in the region of industry. The explanation of such an apparent want of enterprise is that Japanese capitalists are determined not to put their money into any undertaking which is not sound at once from a business and from a scientific point of view. Men look for combinations of practical experience and scientific research, and until such combinations come in sight no large expansion need be expected. Things probably will remain in their present condition for another year, if not longer.

Naturally the conversation turned upon the new Convention, which was welcomed by all present as an additional guarantee of peace, and as an indirect means of drawing closer together the bonds of friendship between Japan and France.

THE CHINCHOW-AIGUN RAILWAY.

It would seem as though this project had finally dropped out of the catalogue of immediate probabilities. The North China Daily News has a telegram which says that the programme is meeting with strong opposition and that the British Government has declared itself unwilling to assist the promoters. In these circumstances the alternative plan of building the line as far as Yaonan has been taken up, and it is understood that Sir Edward Grey has intimated his Government's willingness to promote the reduced project, which, he believes, would not provoke opposition from either Japan or Russia. The telegram concludes by saying that such a solution of the question commends itself from a diplomatic point of view.

FORMOSA.

Friday, July 8.

According to telegrams received by the Asahi Shimbun the proximate purpose of the present campaign has been attained. The strategical plan was to bring about the concentration of the aborigines in the Gaogan district, and thus leave open an opportunity for the troops to construct an artillery road to the summit of Bonbon Hill. So soon as field pieces can be placed on the latter eminence, Gaogan will become untenable, and the troubles of the aborigines will then commence in earnest. But we confess that this explanation does not seem altogether satisfactory. According to our contemporary the field of operations is so limited as to be within range of artillery fire from Bonbon Hill, and in such circumstances it is not at all probable that the movements of the Japanese forces can be concealed from the nimble-footed aborigines.

This view is confirmed by information furnished to the Fiji Shimpō by one of the principal officials concerned. He says that some people regard the campaign as a species of tiger hunt, but in truth it is rather a replica of Port Arthur. The aborigines are extremely skilled in scouting operations, and in fighting under cover. Their long feuds among themselves have developed expert tactical knowledge and rendered them formidable adversaries, especially in a most difficult country, with every inch of which they are thoroughly familiar. When it comes to verbal discussions they are equally difficult to answer. The contention they advance is that Formosa may have been ceded by the Chinese to Japan, but they were never consulted about the cession and were never consenting parties. From time immemorial they have occupied their present positions, and no country has ever invalidated their right by conquering them. Why should they not be left undisturbed?

The Emperor is about to despatch another Chamberlain to carry comforts to the soldiers at the front.

It is said that the able-bodied men in the Gaogan district number fully 800, and that their complete subjugation is likely to prove a very sanguinary affair.

Sunday, July 10.

Lieut. Shibuya, who has just arrived at Moji from Formosa, says that the number of wounded now under treatment in the Island is 7 commissioned officers and 90 rank and file. He relates that all the available troops with the exception of 100 men were dispatched from Taipeh to operate against the aborigines, and Chinese bandits took advantage of this absence to commit various depredations in the vicinity of Taipeh and Keelung. A force was accordingly moved out from Hozan, and order was quickly restored. The same authority is quoted as saying that the operations from the Shinchiku direction have been much more successful than those in the Gilan district, a difference which he attributes to the fact that the Shinchiku column made no use of the Aiyu from the outset, but conducted the whole affair on purely military lines.

It is stated that the Japanese authorities have decided to reward good services in Formosa in the same manner as they are compensated in Korea. A sum of 2 million yen had been allotted for the latter purpose, and half of it will now be devoted to Formosa.

Should that prove insufficient, recourse will be had to the Second Reserve.

News comes from the Kagi district of Formosa to the effect that there has practically been no rainfall since May, and the district is threatened with a loss of 50 per cent of the rice crop and 30 per cent of the sugar canes. This would mean a diminution of crops over the whole Island to the extent of about 10 per cent. Rice has already risen 10 sen per picul, and the situation is aggravated by continuous stormy weather in the south, which renders import business at Takao impossible.

Monday, July 11.

The fighting alike in the Gilan and in the Shinchiku districts is of a desultory character. On the 7th inst. a party of 30 Japanese soldiers under the command of a sergeant proceeded from Bonbon-yama to procure a supply of water and were attacked en route by some 30 aborigines. The fight lasted from early morning until 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and the Japanese had one killed and one wounded. In the Shinchiku quarter the aborigines confine themselves to occasional reconnaissances, which do not appear to have been productive of any casualties. An interesting fact is that a battery of heavy artillery has been sent to the front from Keelun. If long range guns can be got into position, that is undoubtedly the best way of dealing with such foes, but it means, of course, a very tedious campaign, as roads have to be made for the transport of the guns.

Tuesday, July 12.

It is stated that since the 19th ult. the conduct of the fighting in Formosa has been entrusted entirely to the hands of the military. The police and the Aiyu are now restricted entirely to the duty of guarding the positions already won, and of protecting convoys. The number of killed on the side of the police and Aiyu since the commencement of the operations has been 39, and the number on the side of the military, 33, but in the accounts from which we quote no statement is made about the number of the wounded.

It appears that another company of infantry with a battery of heavy artillery has been sent round by sea to Sowu on the East coast. These troops will march to Yenzan to form the rear guard of the column now having its base at Bonbon-yama. The immediate objective of attack appears to be a very steep hill called Shinaretsu (or Shinarek) which commands the position of the aborigines at Gaogan, and which will probably be the scene of severe fighting. Thus far, the troops sent to occupy this position have not made progress, the difficulties of the ground having proved more formidable than was anticipated.

But we note that a telegram from the Governor-General's office reports the successful occupation of this hill on the 7th inst. and speaks of the surrender of several leaders of the aborigines.

In the Shinchiku direction some sharp fighting occurred on the forenoon of the 9th inst. The Japanese had posted guns on a commanding position when they found that to secure this point it was necessary to gain possession of a neighbouring eminence. The corps detached for the purpose succeeded in effecting its object, though not without some loss, but thereafter a force of some 200 aborigines made a fierce attack upon the gun position. They were driven back, however, without inflicting any serious damage on the Japanese. The casualties for that day were 2 killed and 5 wounded.

The Authorities are quoted as saying that the aborigines in the Gaogan district have weakened considerably and that their final subjugation will be probably effected at the end of this month or the beginning of the next. It will then be necessary to proceed against Taroko, on the east coast, where a very difficult task is anticipated.

Wednesday, July 13.

The operations in Formosa continue but are not on a decisive scale. In the eastern part of the field we read of a kraal formed on a hill top about 2,000 feet above the level of the sea where something like a hundred aborigines have taken refuge. It may prove a very difficult task to dislodge these men.

From the rest of the field, namely the Shinchiku region, intelligence comes that a band of about 50 aborigines vehemently attacked the commissariat of the 3rd corps on the 9th inst. They were repulsed after a sharp skirmish, in which the Japanese had 4 soldiers killed and 2 wounded, one of the latter being an Aiyu. The enemies' attitude in this region is still aggression.

THE BOYCOTT.

It is now confidently alleged that the boycott against Japanese ships and merchandise has at length been completely abandoned by the Chinese merchants in Australia, Manila and Hongkong. Now for the first time Chinese subjects are freely taking passage in Japanese ships. It must be confessed that the Chinese showed great determination and perseverance in carrying out this boycott. They were, of course, encouraged by newspapers which sacrificed everything to their love of harrassing Japan, but we do not suppose that the utterances of a few insignificant local journals can have produced much affect upon the Chinese people. The interesting reflection is that the Chinese resolutely closed their eyes to the justice of Japan's action and allowed themselves to be betrayed into a demonstration which no honest publicist can for a moment justify. The action of the Canton authorities in the case of the Tatsu Maru was wholly indefensible, and it says little for the intelligence of public opinion in China that such a wrong found so many supporters.

NAVAL INCREMENT.

Tokyo newspapers unite in stating that an agreement has been elaborated between Mr. Wakatsuki, Vice-Minister of Finance, and Mr. Takarabi, Vice-Minister of the Navy, with regard to naval increment. It has been agreed that the minimum strength of the navy shall be fixed in accordance with the principle of maritime defence first, and military defence second. There shall not be any disturbance of the Cabinet's determination to refrain from all addition to the national debt, neither shall there be any definitely fixed programme as has been the precedent hitherto. What will be done is simply to apply 15 or 20 millions out of the annual surplus and to utilize this grant for purposes of building big and heavily armed ships. The policy of construction at home shall be pursued as far as possible so as to prevent the exodus of specie, and in short the whole programme, while practical, is essentially conservative.

THE NEGRO QUESTION IN AMERICA.

Count Hayashi is quoted by the Mamichi Dempo as expressing himself quite unable to explain the recent occurrences in the United States. Whether they mean that the black folks betrayed inordinate exultation over the victory of their champion, or whether they indicate that the white people were exasperated at the defeat of their representative, it is at present impossible to say. But on the whole the attitude of the American people towards the Negro problem constitutes an exhibition of racial prejudice beyond the understanding of Orientals. In Japan, since old times, a child born to parents of mixed Eta and Japanese blood was always regarded and treated as a duly qualified Japanese subject, and the celebrated Chinese Emperor Chienlung had a Mahomedan concubine. But in the United States a child of mixed negro and white blood is just as much tabooed as though it were the offspring of black people purely. Thus the Americans may be said to discard their own offspring. Oriental people do not understand such prejudices. We (Japan Mail) quote these utterances for the sake of the source to which they are attributed, but we doubt the accuracy of the reporter.

GERMANY IN CHINA.

It is regrettable that the mischief-makers should be again at work, seeking to sow seeds of discord between England and Germany. The Chinese students from Shantung are reported to have started an anti-German agitation in Peking and to be contemplating a boycott of German goods. The proximate cause is not stated, but it must be frankly confessed that Germany's position in Shantung is conspicuously vulnerable, for reasons which we have no desire to reiterate, and that Chinese students, imbued with the Rights-Recovery mania, are not unlikely to take her for a target of attack. Her presence has been most beneficial to the region, and we believe that if a plebiscite of the inhabitants were taken to-morrow, independently of politics, the result would be conspicuously favourable to her continued tenure of Kiaochow. But from the students' point of view the situation may wear a different aspect. What warrant then is there for assuming that this Peking agitation and this proposed boycott are the outcome of secret instigation on the part of Englishmen? It is not thus that Englishmen seek to compass their ends.

THE SOUTH POLE.

An office has been opened under the auspices of Count Okuma for the purpose of collecting funds to meet the expenses of Lieut. Shirase's projected expedition to the South Pole. The idea is that the Japanese explorers should set out 3 weeks ahead of the Scott expedition, with the hope of planting the Rising Sun at the South Pole before the Union Jack can be run up. The Asahi Shimbun has taken the lead in opening its columns to subscribers, and it invites donations of any sum from 50 sen upwards until the end of August. This is a very plucky move on the part of the Japanese, and we wish them every success. It is an open field and there need be no favour or affection.

MR R. KONDO.

On the forenoon of the 11th instant Mr. R. Kondo returned to Tokyo from China after an absence of more than a month, as leader of the party of business-men whose tour in the Middle Kingdom from Manchuria to Soochow afforded so many interesting experiences. Mr. Kondo seems to have been eminently successful in that capacity. He has a remarkable command of clear and appropriate language, and this, combined with a genial personality, social tact and exceptional business perspicacity fitted him eminently to take the leading part in a function which the slightest solecism might have marred. Everywhere his few quiet, well chosen and evidently sincere words, appear to have produced an excellent effect, and the happy results undoubtedly achieved by the mission are largely attributable to his efforts. What the future may have in store for China it is hard indeed to predict, but certainly she has no more valuable asset than Japanese friendship; and Japan, on her side, has everything to gain by cultivating Chinese amity. From these points of view such relations as those established by the recent visit of Mr. R. Kondo and his fellow-merchants to China have great international importance.

THE SOY COMPANY.

It will be remembered that the chief difficulty in settling this Company's affairs has been unwillingness on the part of the Konoike Bank to compromise its claim, and some invidious remarks have been directed against the Bank. In consequence the Bank now publishes its reasons, and very sound reasons they seem. It says, in effect, that the money (1,300,000 yen) was lent to a solid Company under the management of men of property who are well able to meet all their liabilities and who can at any moment call up 6½ millions of unpaid capital. It is the duty of these men to discharge their legitimate obligations. Instead of doing so they ask the Bank to purchase at an extravagant price the site and the debris of the burned factory at Amagasaki; or else to accept payment in a long series of annual installments. The Bank finds no excuse for such a procedure.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

The figures of the foreign trade during the first ten days of July are:—

	Yen.
Exports	10,134,000
Imports	10,923,000
Excess of Imports.....	789,000

The figures for the period January 1st to July 10th are:—

	Yen.	Compared with 1909.
Exports	220,963,000	+25,874,000
Imports	250,799,000	+25,962,000

THE HYOCHUTO.

On the afternoon of the 7th inst. the British Admiral on this station and the officers of the British Squadron then lying in Port Arthur paid a formal visit to the monument erected in memory of the officers and men who lost their lives during the memorable siege. Instead of laying a garland of flowers at the base of the monument the visitors presented a buoy marked with a date and the name of the flagship in letters of gold. The ceremony was conducted with all solemnity, and that evening the squadron set sail for Weihaiwei.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Friday, July 8.

The market yesterday showed some signs of hardening. They were not very marked, but they suggested bottom had been reached.

Saturday, July 9.

There was a slight improvement on Saturday, owing chiefly to news of the appreciation of silver in London, but sellers are waiting for an opportunity to unload, and consequently the volume of transactions was small. Moreover a feeling of depression made itself again apparent towards the close of the session.

Monday, July 11.

Yesterday witnessed a marked improvement all round, owing to news that an agreement had been reached by the Naval Department and the Finance Department.

Tuesday, July 12.

The general tone yesterday, especially in the afternoon session, was good, but there were some exceptions, notably the Tokyo Gas, which seems likely to have to pay a much heavier municipal tax than heretofore, owing to re-measurement of its pipes. Orders from Osaka sent up the price of Tokyo Exchanges.

Wednesday, July 13.

The temporary recovery on the 12th was followed by a relapse on the 13th, but things steadied a little in the afternoon session. We append the quotations for September delivery:—

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Two Japanese submarines accompanied by the torpedo depot-ship Toyohashi, have just made a successful voyage on the high seas. Sailing out from Kure they passed through the Strait of Shimonoseki and then proceeded to Saseho, Karatsu and Hirado, subsequently steaming across to Tsushima and returning to Saseho. This is the first trip made by Japanese destroyers outside enclosed waters, and considerable importance seems to be attached to it.

Four years ago Dr. Fujii, who was employed by the Siamese Government to organize a charity hospital in Bangkok, observed that there was growing upon a moor in the vicinity a plant which seemed to yield a good cotton. He brought a specimen to Japan, and submitted it to be examined by the well-known cotton merchant Mr. Hibiya Heizayemon, who pronounced it equal to American "middling." Mr. Fujii then entered into consultation with Mr. Masao, a Japanese legal expert in the service of the Siamese Government, and the two men obtained a lease of 40 acres of land, where they have been growing cotton with great success. The leased area has now been extended to 400 acres, which the Siamese Government has granted in perpetuity, free of all taxes, and with a promise to extend the area if desired. Mr. Fujii explained all this at a recent meeting of the Cotton Spinners' Association, and it would seem that considerable importance is attached to the affair as promising an ample supply of cheap cotton comparatively near at hand. Of course if the Korean plantations fulfil the expectations formed of them, this Siamese venture will be more or less superfluous.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun quotes a Government official as saying, with perfect truth it seems to us, that nothing is needed more urgently in Japan at present than more stringent laws for regulating the conduct of joint stock companies' affairs. Under the present system everything is virtually left in the hands of the managing directors. The ordinary directors and the auditors have really no voice whatever in the disbursement of funds, and that such liberty is not expedient has been amply proved by the conduct of several of the directors in the past two or three years. When the Commercial Code was originally submitted for the opinion of the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce, it contained various restrictive provisions bearing on this very point. But the Chamber strenuously opposed such a legislation and it was accordingly omitted. It would now seem however that the original framers of the Code were right and that some radical amendments of the law are expedient.

The returns of the Bank of Japan show that during the month of June, out of 56 commodities tabulated, 9 appreciated, 18 depreciated and 29 remain without change, the net result being a fall of 0.6 on the average. This was to have been expected. The month of June must be described as a time of marked depression. There was no briskness in tradal circles; shares and stocks fell, and complete stagnation prevailed in the money market. No satisfactory explanation is forthcoming. There is nothing the matter with the climate, nor have there been any business failures to shake public confidence. We do not find that Japanese newspapers make any attempt to explain the situation. The depression is now said to have lasted fully 3½ years and its experience shows that such an interval has seldom elapsed in the history of Japan's past without some marked change.

Her Majesty Queen Alexandra's letter to the British Nation, written on May 10th, has been reproduced in facsimile by Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons, the celebrated art publishers of London. It is enclosed in a beautifully designed and finely executed frame, from the hands of Mr. Edward I. Poynter and Mr. Leopold Lowenstam, and under the signature are two exquisite medallions of King Edward and the Queen.

We regret to announce the death of Viscountess Akimoto, which took place on the 9th inst. at 6 p.m. The deceased lady had been suffering for some months from kidney trouble, and serious complications set in a few days ago. Viscountess Akimoto was a granddaughter of the celebrated Rekko, feudal chief of Mito.

It is stated that the Government has decided to undertake strict investigations into the condition of all the petty banks with a view to abolish those which are found guilty of any irregularity. This step has long been on the tapis, but it has been postponed on account of the unsuitability of the time.

The Tokyo Court of Appeal has rejected the appeals of Messrs. Akiyama and Isomura, who are usually regarded as the chief offenders in the sugar scandal. They were sentenced to 4 years' and 3½ years' major confinement, respectively, and the sentence has now been confirmed.

The Emperor sent on the 9th inst. a chamberlain to visit the residence of the late Marquis Tokugawa, and to convey a rescript eulogizing the services of the deceased at the time of the Restoration. His Majesty also contributed 1,000 yen towards the funeral expenses.

At present there are four steamers plying between Bakan and Fusan, but only two of them, the Iki and the Tsushima, can be counted as up to modern requirements. Evidently when the Mukden-Antung Railway is completed, there is a strong probability that passengers and goods traffic will increase between Fusan and Bakan. The Railway Authorities have therefore, it is said, decided to build two new steamers of 3,000 tons each at the Mitsubishi and the Kawasaki Docks. Each of these vessels will have accommodation for 40 1st class passengers and 456 2nd and 3rd class, as well as for about 500 tons of merchandise.

We regret to read in the columns of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun that Viscount Sone's condition becomes daily graver. He suffers excruciating pain, and relief is obtained only by the injection of anesthetics. The nature of the malady renders the assimilation of nourishment almost impossible, and the patient grows steadily weaker. Dr. Kikuchi is in constant attendance. It appears that the Viscount's face has begun to show signs of swelling which is one of the worst symptoms. Our contemporary now speaks of the end of July as the probable limit of the Viscount's life.

In the case of 15 of the treaty Powers, notice of the termination of the present treaty after one year's time will be given on the 17th inst. France will receive notice on the 4th of August, and one other Power on the 20th of September. But the United States Government persists in maintaining its contention that notice cannot be given before 1911. This makes very little difference so far as the Tariff is concerned, since America has no conventional tariff with Japan, but, of course, the delay is very inconvenient for many reasons.

The Bank of Korea began operations on the 1st of January, and is to hold its first half yearly general meeting on the 15th of August. The directors explain that owing to the depressed condition of business and to the immaturity of their operations, the business done by the Bank during the first 6 months of the year was comparatively small. Almost the only staples that were dealt in to any considerable extent were rice shares. The net profits shown in the books are 38,000 yen in Seoul, 6,600 yen at Pyongyang and 1,700 yen at Chinnampo. On the other hand there was a heavy outlay on account of buildings at Chemulpo, so that the money available for dividend is only 26,200 yen. In these circumstances it becomes necessary to fall back upon the Government guarantee of 6 per cent.

The four Japanese subjects who were sentenced to 9 months' imprisonment in Hawaii for seditious conduct, in connection with the recent agitation for increased wages, were released on the 4th of July after completing only 3 months of that term.

We read in Tokyo journals that the War Department has arranged with the local authorities at Hakodate for transferring to the Yushukan at Kudan two out of four guns which have been lying in the park at Hakodate for many years. These guns originally belonged to a Russian vessel which made her escape from the Black Sea during the Crimean War, and, reaching Shimoda in Izu, was converted into a merchantman, handing over her armament to the Tokugawa authorities. The latter transferred the vessel's four guns to the fort at Bentenzaki in Yezo, and ultimately these pieces found their way into the Hakodate Park. Two are now to be carried to the Yushukan in Tokyo and two will remain at Hakodate.

It is stated that on the 9th inst. at 5 p.m. the Parliamentary Building Committee will present its first plans to the Minister President of State. The estimated cost of the new constructions and of the park in which they are to stand is 17 million yen, and the buildings will cover 18,000 tsubo (150 acres), being thus twice as large as the present edifices. The site will comprise the Horse Administration Bureau, the Chinese Legation, the official residence of the Prime Minister, and the residences of Marquis Nabeshima and Prince Shimazu. There will be 238 rooms, and each Chamber will have sitting accommodation for 450 members.

It will be observed that nothing is said about including Sanno Hill, and we presume that the programme has been proportionately reduced. None the less, an expenditure of 17 million yen is a very formidable figure.

On the 11th instant the graduation ceremony at the Imperial University took place in the presence of the Emperor. There were 893 graduates divided as follow:—

Law	335
Medicine	118
Engineering	209
Literature	109
Natural Philosophy	43
Agriculture	88

There were 14 recipients of Imperial prizes. The names of the prize-men were Messrs. Hirose, Tsuzumi, Yagami, Watanabe, Sasaki, Kimura (D.), Yamashina, Akita, Ryo, Bunya, Yoshikawa, Kimura (Z.), Makino, and Takenouchi. It will be understood that these names are not in order of merit but are merely divided according to their departments.

It is stated that the Philippine Authorities have vetoed the importation of Japanese rice. About 300,000 yen worth of this staple now finds its way every year to Manila, and as it will no longer be used in public offices, prisons or factories, the Japanese export trade will suffer somewhat. Of course the object of the American Authorities is to check the spread of beri-beri; but according to the most recent experiments in Japan, rice eating does not produce that disease if the unhulled kind be used.

On the 19th inst. the shares of the Chiyo-da Gas Co. made an upward leap of more than two points, which fact is attributed to talk of amalgamation with the Tokyo Gas Company.

The Government is continuing its campaign rigorously against banks which partake of the nature of lotteries. There are several of these institutions in Tokyo. Their method of procedure is to collect a certain sum monthly from depositors, and after a fixed period lots are drawn. Those whose names emerge first in the lottery receive the total hitherto lodged by them plus a large addition based on the idea that their deposits will be continued. The next drawing is on the same principle, and of course if the successful subscribers choose to abscond, their credulous comrades suffer loss, but if everything is conducted fairly the limit of profit is the interest of the money paid in advance. Three of these banks have been suspended within the last few months, one called the Honjo Bank, another the Azuma and the third the Shinyei. A further bank is said to be on the verge of the same fate. It has been a kind of itinerant institution, but its last tenement has been discovered in the Azabu district.

A serious accident occurred on the Kobu Railway on the 12th inst. Owing to the heavy and continuous rain a land-slip had been caused in the Saruhashi tunnel, and at 4.14 p.m., a train dashed into the debris, bringing down a further quantity of rubbish by the shock.

One person was killed, namely a middle-school student, and 17 persons were injured. Two cars were completely wrecked, and the line is of course obstructed. Nothing is yet known as to the time when the service can be re-opened. The tunnel is 1,600 yards long, and the catastrophe took place in complete obscurity which added not a little to the horrors of the situation.

Sensational telegrams arrive from San Francisco as might have been expected, with reference to Germany's action in recognizing the Nicaraguan Presidency. It is suggested that this action on Germany's part is deliberately intended to embarrass the United States in the prosecution of its great enterprise. But moderate persons are not at all likely to take such a view of the incident. Before these words are in type an explanation will doubtless be forthcoming, but in the meanwhile we decline to believe either that there has been a mistake in Germany's diplomatic procedure or that Berlin has adopted any measure inimical to America's interest.

The train which left Vladivostock on the 8th inst., for Moscow was derailed at a point about 9 hours' distant from its place of departure. On examination it appeared that a herd of oxen, numbering about 16, had strayed on to the line, and several of them had been run over by the carriages. The region where this occurrence took place is said to be infested with Hunghtsz and it is believed that the oxen were purposely driven on to the line. But this theory is difficult to believe, seeing that the bandits took no advantage of the situation to despoil the passengers by the train. The telegram does not state whether there was any injury to life or limb.

Mr. Nakanokoji, Vice-Minister of Communications, writes from Moscow that he experienced extraordinary civility on his journey from Japan. Every possible arrangement was made for his comfort by the Russian Authorities, and every conceivable facility was afforded for obtaining information and for sight-seeing en route. Mr. Nakanokoji attributes this to the kind solicitude of His Excellency the Russian Ambassador in Tokyo.

A very splendid edifice has just been opened in Osaka as the Cathedral of the Greek Church in that part of Japan. Archbishop Nicolai was present at the opening ceremony on the 12th inst. as was also His Excellency the Russian Ambassador at the Court of Japan. Among the appurtenances of the Cathedral are 24 oil paintings by a celebrated Russian artist, the gift of a well-known philanthropist.

THE REORGANISED TRANS-SIBERIAN TRAIN SERVICE.

The new arrangements which have now been finally completed between the International Sleeping Car Company and the Imperial Russian Railway Department, for a more satisfactory running of the trans-Siberian Express trains, come into operation to-day, and will doubtless prove of great interest and convenience to the public.

Hitherto there have been two distinct trains running on the trans-Siberian route—the so-called Russian State trains and those of the "International Sleeping Car Company," with the result that the public had often cause to complain of indifferent service, and which was invariably laid at the door of the International Sleeping Car Company, in their capacity of sole General Agents in the Far East for the sale of tickets over this line.

Connections could not always be guaranteed, as steamers from and to Japan ran in the interests of opposing concerns; while great delay and annoyance was frequently caused through applications for berths not receiving prompt attention at the hands of the railway authorities on the Siberian side.

From to-day, however, this old régime will be long absolutely to the past, and a new one, with a contract of 10 years—guaranteed by the Imperial Russian Government Railways—in-augured.

The International Sleeping Car Company have taken over the whole of the 70 passenger cars which belonged to and were operated by the Chinese Eastern Railway, constituting the so-called Russian State trains, and these trains on the lines Vladivostock-Changchun-Irkutsk, have now been merged into the rolling stock of the International Sleeping Car Company and adorned with the name of this famous transportation concern.

They will henceforth be exclusively operated in conjunction with their own Wagon-Lits trains; by their own staff of officials and uniformed train attendants, and except for the difference in fittings and accommodation become an identical and integral part of the Wagons-Lits services over the trans-Siberian route; to all intents and purposes the only express service over that line between Europe and the Far East. The price of tickets will be exactly the same for berths in the ci-devant Russian state car as it is in a Wagon-Lits carriage, while good attendance, time schedule, and the whole management of the passenger service will be in the hands of the International Sleeping Car Co. The new arrangement enables the Company to book passengers for specially designated berths in trains on whatever day of the month and for any period in advance if they so desire, and the arrangements for the steamer services in connection with the trans-Siberian trains will in future be arranged through the International Sleeping Car Company.

The trains will run as heretofore in two sections, one from Vladivostock and one from Changchun, joining together at Harbin into one train to Irkutsk, where all change into the connecting State Express train for Moscow or St. Petersburg.

But from May next year a magnificent train-de-luxe service will come into operation once a week, right through from Vladivostock to the European frontiers without change of cars.

A proposal has been made by the Company to the Imperial Japanese Railway Board to run a specially constructed and similar train de-luxe on the Korean and South Manchuria Railway lines from Fusan and Dairen to Changchun, the Wagon-Lits Co. furnishing the entire equipments of their cars and operating them with their own staff of attendants, and in a similar manner in which the Wagon-Lits trains are being operated all over the European railway lines.

If this proposal were accepted it would mean that passengers from Fusan or Dairen could board a Wagon-Lits train-de-luxe at these ports, run on to the junction of Changchun and there be transferred to exactly similar cars, which would ultimately bring them to the European frontiers. The enormous benefit which both the public and the respective railway companies would derive from such an arrangement in a large increased passenger traffic and superior travelling accommodation, is so apparent that it needs no further elucidation.

The officials of the South Manchurian Railways have expressed themselves in favour of such a proposal, and it is devoutly to be wished that the frank coöperation of all parties concerned will be given, in order that this excellent through service between Japan, Manchuria, Korea and Europe may become an accomplished fact at an early date.

The trans-Siberian Railway has become an international highway between the East and West, and it is to be hoped that this character will be recognised by all those who have it in their power to further the facilities for travel on this road.

THE PRESTON "HERALD" CASE

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT OF APPEAL.

Judgment has been delivered in the Court of Appeal in the appeal lodged by the Japan Herald Kabushiki Kaisha and Mr. T. Satchell, late Editor of the Japan Daily Herald, against the decision of the Court of First Instance, by which the defendants were ordered to pay Mr. W. T. R. Preston the sum of 5,000 yen as damages for loss of reputation and to publish an apology in various journals. The judgment on appeal reduces the amount of damages to 2,500 yen, to be paid by either of the defendants.

The original action was lodged by W. T. R. Preston, the then Canadian Trade Commissioner to Japan, who claimed that the reproduction in the Japan Daily Herald of an article, criticising his official attitude, originally published in the Victoria Daily Colonist, had damaged his reputation to the extent of 20,000 yen.

THE LAW COURT.

ACTION FOR DIVORCE.

On the 8th instant decision was given in the Yokohama Local Court in the case lodged by Mrs. Edmund L. Filmer, petitioning for a divorce from her husband Mr. Edmund L. Filmer. The verdict was in favour of plaintiff and defendant was ordered to bear the costs of the action.

DIVORCE AND THE CHURCH.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 9)

THE evidence which has more recently been given before the Royal Commission on Divorce and Matrimonial Causes serves to emphasize the contention which the Sociologist and the New Woman (however they may differ on questions of race and sex-equality) agree in supporting—that England alone, of all civilized countries, retains a mediæval attitude of undue ecclesiastical severity towards the question of the marriage law. The view of the Church, of course, is that marriage is a sacrament—above all man-made laws—and, being such, must be regarded as indissoluble. The view of a large, and a probably increasing, number of ordinary people is that marriage is a merely a contract, terminable at the wish of either party as easily as any other sort of partnership. It seems to us entirely a matter of the point of view from which the question is regarded. The Churchman is right, according to his interpretation of the wedded state, and so is “the man in the street.” And it must be confessed that, if the tendencies of the time are taken into consideration, what may be called the “modern” view of the matrimonial contract will ultimately prevail. The religious aspect of marriage, we fear, will weaken—the passing of the Deceased Wife’s Sister Bill by both houses of Parliament is a significant indication of the trend of thought upon this subject, even in conservative England; the grounds and facilities for the dissolution of the wedded state will be extended, and the recourse to that intermediate and most unsatisfactory expedient, judicial separation, will tend to decrease. In the meanwhile, it is remarkable how wide a divergence of opinion is shown upon the subject even by the layman. To take the single proposition that a divorce should be granted in the event of either party being sentenced to a long term of penal servitude, we are inclined to think that most people would agree that this was a reasonable ground for annulling the marriage bond. But it would seem that Lord ALVERSTONE, whose long experience as Solicitor-General entitles him to speak with some authority, declined, in his evidence before the Commission, to admit that it was a sufficient cause. His lordship takes the view that it is cruel to inflict upon a man sentenced to a penal servitude the additional hardship of rendering him liable to an action for divorce. But what about the hardship inflicted upon the wife who has to live for years in solitude, awaiting the return of her felon, and probably brutalized, husband? Evidently Lord ALVERSTONE thinks that the man’s grievance in this case outweighs that of the woman whose society and support he is compelled to abandon. Similar unexpected divergencies of opinion are revealed in the evidence which has been poured forth in abundance before the Royal Commission, emphasizing the extreme difficulty of handling this problem and of arriving at a solution satisfactory to both parties. As to the extension of the grounds of divorce, the American State Laws have been subjected to investigation, and an American barrister, Mr. NEWTON CRANE, gave some interesting statistics relating to the practice of divorce in the great Republic, which may be epitomized as follows:—

There was only one State, South Carolina, where divorce was not permitted, and only one State, New York, where misconduct had to be proved before a decree could be obtained. In all the other States misconduct was a ground for divorce, but there was a variety of other grounds. Desertion and cruelty, in varying forms and degrees, were common grounds in all the States. In fifteen States the desertion need be only for one year. Cruelty was a cause in nearly every State, and in some of the States “outrages rendering life together insupportable,” “indignities rendering cohabitation intolerable,” “personal abuse or conduct rendering life burdensome,” and “treatment endangering health or reason” were also specified grounds. In 35 States habitual drunkenness was a cause for divorce, and in a very large majority of them conviction for felony. In five States conviction for felony prior to marriage and unknown to the other party was a sufficient cause, as in one State was the fact that a spouse was a fugitive from justice. In some of the States the law associated drunkenness in this connection with addiction to opium and other drugs. Insanity in varying degrees was a cause in nine States, vagrancy in two, and neglect to provide for wife and children in 19. In Louisiana “public defamation of one party by the other,” in Florida “violent temper,” and in Kentucky “violent and ungovernable temper” were causes. However, despite the widespread belief in England to the contrary, in no State was “incompatibility of temperament” a cause for divorce, with the possible exception of the State of Washington, where the Statute authorised the Court to grant a decree when it was satisfied that, for any cause, the parties could no longer live together. Of all the various causes for divorce the one most commonly relied on was desertion.

As to the administration of the Divorce Law and the costs of such cases, the same authority stated that:—

Not only was there a great variety of cause for divorce in the United States, but the law was administered by a very large number of Judges of diverse views and varying capacities. There were probably at least 1,000 Judges in the United States who had authority to dissolve marriage, and he would not be surprised to learn that there were 3,000. The cost of divorce in America was principally a matter of attorney’s fees, the costs payable to the State being merely nominal.

With regard to the almost phenomenal increase of divorce, in America another legal expert said that one cause was “the enormous development in the employment of women, which had thrown the sexes more together, with more danger to both.” The same witness was at pains to show that other countries besides his own had extended the grounds for divorce:—

It had been suggested that one of the chief causes of the great number of divorces in the United States was the extended grounds on which divorce was granted in some States. But in practically every European country the divorce rate had been steadily increasing for many years, and yet the grounds on which divorce was granted varied from three in France to twelve in Sweden. In several countries the grounds were as liberal as in any State of the American Union. Thus in Austria they had “invincible aversion”; in Hungary, “vexatious mortification”; in Belgium, “grave indignities”; in France, “prodigality and violent disposition”; and in Sweden, “opposition of feeling and thought amounting to hate.” “Loquacity” was a sufficient cause in Formosa—(laughter)—and “previous wooing in which no final acceptance or refusal has been had” might successfully be pleaded in Algeria. (Laughter.)

On the other hand the attitude of the Church is unbending. The annual report of the English Church Union contains a strong condemnation of the suggestion that the difficulty might be avoided “by the adoption of compulsory civil marriage, leaving the State to make what laws it pleases concerning affinity and divorce, and that all would be well if the Church were protected in the maintenance of her own discipline over her own members;” and proceeds to declare that “in the interests of public morality it would be well if the indissolubility of marriage could once more be affirmed by law.” But the gravest pronouncement upon the subject has come from the BISHOP of LONDON, who in an address at his last Diocesan Conference spoke as follows:—

“We have the deepest sympathy with any who have married either a bad woman or a bad man, and of course legal separation must always be allowed in justice to the wronged partner; but it is the remarriage which upsets the principle, and the state of affairs which has grown up on the other side of the Atlantic in consequence of the abandonment of this one safeguarding principle excites the alarm not only of Churchmen but of leading statesmen. The Divorce Commission has brought us to a critical position in this matter. It is quite clear that we must oppose the extension to the poor of what we believe to have been a curse to the rich; but if, in spite of our protests, the facilities for divorce are brought down to the poorest, and there is a Divorce Court in every county, then I want it very carefully discussed whether the time has not come when we should cut the Gordian knot by having all marriages conducted before a civil authority, and inviting to receive the blessing of the Church those only who accept and obey the Church’s rule. And if the bullying and threatening to which some of my faithful priests in London have been to my knowledge subjected during the last few years is going to be increased and spread throughout the country, then it may well be that even so great a change as Disestablishment would be preferable to a state of things which would strain the consciences and vex the souls of good men beyond endurance.”

That such a calamity as Disestablishment of the Church of England should follow as a sequel to any relaxation of the law of Divorce would indeed be a matter of regret to the great majority of Englishmen, and it is devoutly to be hoped that some via media may be found, as a result of the present Commission’s enquiries, by which the undoubted hardships and abuses of the law may be removed without offending the conscience of the Church.

CRITICISMS OF THE CONVENTION.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 12.)

UNDERLYING some of the public criticisms evoked by the new Convention is an evident conviction that without some such preventive Russia and Japan must have fought again. The Frankfurter Zeitung, indeed, goes so far as to allege that the document will not affect the situation between the high contracting parties since they are natural enemies. But that extreme view, whatever be the number of its secret endorsers, has found expression in one quarter only. The more general estimate seems to be that the two Powers must have come to blows had they not agreed to divide the spoils harmoniously, and that other States will now find themselves left out in the cold so far as Manchuria is concerned. We may assume that there has not been any attempt to show clearly how Russia and Japan propose to apply themselves to the process of international brigandage. Such an analysis would reduce things to a practical basis, and there can be no penchant for practicality on the part of publicists who undertake to found predictions on a document which they have not yet had an opportunity of perusing. Men who pause to think, however, will at once be struck by the reflection that England, though not actually a signatory of, is assuredly a consenting party to, this Convention; that she was consulted at every stage of the negotiations, and that the document embodies no provision inconsistent, however remotely, with the terms of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. That Alliance provides unequivocally for the preservation of China's integrity and the maintenance of the Open Door. Therefore, in order to credit the pessimistic forecasts founded on the Convention, we have to assume that Japan has deliberately broken faith with England, and that England has agreed to be thus openly flouted. Such events are wholly inconceivable and do not merit to be taken into serious consideration. What the Convention has effected, we have very little doubt, is to bracket Russia with Japan and England as one of the protectors of China's integrity and one of the guarantors of the Open Door and Equal Opportunity in the Three Eastern Provinces. In a word, the significance and effect of the Convention are diametrically opposed to the interpretation alleged by the publicists in question. As to the natural enmity supposed to exist between Russia and Japan, one way well ask what causes contribute to it. To allege that Russia and France, or any other two contemninous countries, are natural enemies would be equally logical and equally reasonable. It is in not in any wise extravagant to affirm that no two nations in the world have a larger measure of reciprocal respect or a more genuine desire to avoid quarrels than Russia and Japan have to-day. Then again, we have onlookers suggesting that the Convention was inspired by the neutralization project of Mr. KNOX, and that it is directed against America. The former suggestion may be entertainable, though it is commonly asserted in Japan that the idea of this Convention had long been entertained by the Tokyo statesmen, and that had not Prince ITO's journey to Harbin been fatally interrupted, the necessary pourparlers would have taken place then. That is a very minor point, however. The aim of the Washington Secretary of State was to provide another guarantee of peace, and an effective guarantee has been provided, though not precisely in the manner contemplated by Mr. KNOX. Why should it be supposed that American interests are injured by the Convention? The United States Government seeks nothing, nor has any right to seek anything, beyond the preservation of the status quo, the keeping open of the door and the insuring of equal opportunity. It will be time enough to complain when the Convention is proved to be inimical to any of those objects.

THE WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 12.)

THE series of articles from our own correspondent which appears in this and succeeding issues, giving a summary of the proceedings of the great Missionary Conference recently held at Edinburgh, will, we feel sure, be read with great interest by our readers and receive from them the consideration they merit. We need hardly emphasize the fact that the meeting is of an altogether unprecedented character. Never before has so complete a representation of the labourers in the world's mission-field been seen in a single place, nor so comprehensive a survey of missionary work and methods been submitted to the Churches and, through the press, to the world. Twelve hundred delegates and three thousand visitors have assembled in the Scottish capital from every clime and continent, to place on record the fruits of their labour, to confer, and, if possible, make common cause, as to the course to be pursued in the future by the Church militant on earth. The system adopted by the Conference for the collation and presentment of information as to missionary endeavour in all parts of the globe seems to have been both comprehensive and concise. Nine commissions, each consisting of nearly two hundred expert and recognized authorities, have spent a period of eighteen months in examining some thousands of missionary reports in various forms and languages, and a day has been allotted by the Conference to the consideration of the work of each in turn. The findings of these nine commissions, with the verdict passed upon them after discussion by the Conference, must be taken as authoritative in the highest degree, if not positively final. But the feature of this great gathering which must most impress the outsider, whether at home or abroad, is its remarkably representative character. Every creed and denomination, with the exception of the Roman Catholic Church—an exception which we feel bound to describe as regrettable in the extreme—has been taking part both in the preparatory and in the deliberative work of the Conference. Thus, in association with the Archbishops of CANTERBURY and YORK, and eight other Bishops of the Church of England, we find the leaders of Nonconformist thought and activity, as well as prominent educationists and men of such public standing as Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH, Sir ANDREW FRASER, late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, Sir ERNEST SATOW, whose name needs no recommendation throughout the East, the Hon. W. J. BRYAN, three times Democratic candidate for the Presidency of the United States, and Admiral MAHAN, of the American Navy, the well-known naval expert and writer. The Far East was represented by such men as Dr. TIMOTHY RICHARD, of Shanghai, Dr. A. H. SMITH, of Peking, Bishop M. C. HARRIS, of Korea, Bishop HONDA, of Tokyo, President HARADA, of Kyoto, and other well-known missionaries of China and Japan.

The grandest result such a bringing together of experienced and scholarly men, many of them grown grey in the service of the Lord of the Harvest, could possibly have, is the formation of one Christian Church for evangelistic purposes. Our correspondent calls attention to the fact that "the importance of concerted action on the part of the various missionary organizations of the world, of all churches and countries," received the prompt recognition of the Conference from the very outset. One of the greatest obstacles to the spread of Christianity in foreign lands is the never-ending war, on matters of doctrinal detail, between the various sects which set out to declare to the heathen the one and the same gospel. If the forces of Christianity, as presented in the mission-field, could combine to show to the non-Christian world a solid and united front, their message would carry a tenfold measure of conviction. Broadly speaking, the missionary problem has two aspects—that in which the people to be dealt with are sunk in barbarism, or have no religion at all; and that in which the people approached by the missionary have already a religion of their own, be it Mahomedanism, Confucianism or Buddhism. Thus, the conditions in Africa or the South Sea Islands differ profoundly, for this very reason, from those which prevail in India, China, or Japan. In this context, therefore, the acknowledgment contained in the report of the fourth Commission, "that there is a deposit of truth in every religion and that it is the business of the missionary not to destroy, but to build up," is of the happiest augury in its liberal attitude towards all truth. These supreme qualities of broadmindedness, on the one hand, and unity in presentation of the Christian message, on the other, must supply the keynote of missionary endeavour in the future, if that endeavour is to receive any full and lasting measure of success. As the Secretary to the Conference, Dr. JOHN R. MOTT, reminded the assembly on the opening day, the mission field still contains a vast area of fallow ground: "there are 114 millions of people that are wholly outside even the nominal sphere of Christian missions." So that there is still ample scope for the pushing forward of the great work on uniform lines and in a reinvigorated spirit. As to the question of the autonomy of native Churches, and the special aspects of the missionary problem raised by the delegates from China, Japan and Korea, we hope to revert to these in a subsequent article.

II.

No one interested in the future welfare of the Orient, with its teeming but no longer lethargic millions, can fail to recognize the tremendous possibilities, for good or ill, that await the rising nation of China and its risen neighbour, Japan. From these possibilities the Western world can not hold aloof, even if it would. It was the West that knocked—not over gently—at the gates of the slumbering East. What are to be the consequences, to itself and to the world at large, of this awakening of the East to the influences of the West? The nations that have roused the East are Christian nations. What effect will this fundamental fact, underlying the civilization which, in a sense, has been thrust upon the East, exert upon these Oriental races? This was the momentous question which occupied a large share of attention at the recent World Missionary Conference in the Scottish capital; and the prominent part played by the problem in the deliberations on that unprecedented occasion merely emphasizes the importance of the issues raised by the meeting of the Christian West with the Non-Christian East. The problem is—to quote its pithy summarization by Dr. J. W. DAVIS, of the Doshisha, Kyoto—whether Japan, as the leading Power in the Orient, “is to be swayed by materialism, agnosticism or Christianity.” That the first should be the fate of the nation which, waking first, is marked to lead its fellows—Heaven and its own best friends forbid! That Japan should give itself over to the hopelessness of the agnostic—that unhappy state so near to that of the Fool who said in his heart, “There is no God”—would be an almost equally unfortunate issue of her contact with the Christian West. There can only be one answer to the query, if Japan’s best interests—spiritual, moral or material—are to be consulted. The basis of Japan’s religious life must be attuned to the essential truths and ideals of Christianity. That the problem bristles with difficulties, no one will be found to deny. Their character may be gauged from some of the observations let fall at the Conference. “The idea that Christianity is a foreign religion,” said President HARADA, of Kyoto, “is a fatal handicap to its progress. . . . It is of the utmost importance to show the Japanese people that they could be Christians and loyal Japanese at the same time.” Bishop HONDA, of Tokyo, struck a similar note. “The national spirit” said this Japanese divine, “was closely involved with the idea of independence and responsibility, and, so far as Japan is concerned, missionaries who ignored or violated the national spirit were only courting disaster, while any apparent denationalization on the part of Christian converts would surely bring upon them persecution.” Other speakers laid stress upon the same point, with reference also to China and India. It seems clear that the problem which the missionary has to face in these countries is that of the autonomous church on national lines. Up to that ideal—and less than that, we think, will not satisfy the people of this country, at least—they must be led. As gently as may be, and with all necessary deliberation; but such must be the goal. Otherwise, there is the fear that the Japanese may turn from a “foreign” religion to foreign irreligion. Of that last state there are a few shining (and sneering), examples—will-o’-the-wisps whose fitful illusive gleams invite to moral and spiritual doom. To combat these pernicious lures, it behoves Christian workers in these Eastern lands to sink all their denominational differences, to hold to what is best in the ancient religions with which these countries are endowed, and to bring that best into harmony with the fundamental elements of Christianity. This great work accomplished, in the spirit of liberality and forbearance, the hour will have come for each such church to be invested with its own national character, and to receive, with the unstinted benediction of its founders, the fullest measure of ecclesiastical self government. Is it not thus that England has led her colonies from infancy to manhood? It remains for the Church to take a leaf out of the book of the State.

MISSIONARIES.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 13.)

THESE are, happily, times of free thought.

Any man is at liberty to believe what he likes and to preach what he pleases within the limits of law and order. But in exercising that freedom every man is bound to accord corresponding latitude to his neighbour, and to abstain from vilipending the latter merely because his views are different. This is especially true in the case of religion. Many minds are so constituted that they can not possibly conceive anything which does not appeal to their senses or to their reasoning faculty; and many others—an incomparably larger number—are capable of faith in a great first cause and in the so-called supernatural adjuncts of such a creed. Neither side is entitled to question the other’s sincerity or to charge the other with want of intelligence. Great men have been believers; great men have been sceptics. But the greatest men on either side have always treated the others with courtesy and deference, realizing that to hold divergent views on such subjects does not argue moral depravity or justify abuse. Unfortunately, however, some minds are cast in such an imperious mould that they can not brook the smallest display of opposition. Their confidence in their own perspicacity is so over-weening that they set down as a knave or a simpleton every person venturing to differ from them. They are, in fact, the arch-enemies of free thought, for they hold up to ridicule and opprobrium all that venture to think in a groove different from their own. The idiosyncracies of such despots are vividly illustrated by an address from Sir H. S. MAXIM read at the recent annual dinner of the Rationalist Press Association and reproduced with strong approval by the Japan Herald. In that address Sir HIRAM MAXIM does not hesitate to declare that, having “made rather a profound study, some years ago, of the missionary question in the Far East,” he was “simply amazed at the falsehoods told by the English and American Missionaries.” He does not attempt to particularize these alleged falsehoods, except in one case where he accuses Mr. TORREY of repeatedly misrepresenting Colonel INGERSOLL’S attitude towards the Comstock Law. On the strength of that one misrepresentation he unhesitatingly denounces the whole body of Christian Missionaries and compares them to pigeons which, by careful breeding through many generations, have developed abnormal faculties distinguishing them clearly from the common type of their kind. Similarly, Sir HIRAM says, the process of “clerical selection” exercised during many long centuries has produced a race of men that “can think or reason or even tell the truth on all subjects except those relating to religion.” Now what conclusion are we to draw from this assault by a man of science upon millions of his fellow-men? It is impossible to arrive at any conviction except that, like the lecturer on temperance who, by appearing before his audience in a state of drunkenness, offered a practical illustration of the curse of inebriety, so Sir HIRAM S. MAXIM invited the Rationalist Press Association to observe the stupendous falsehoods into which a prejudiced man may be betrayed when he attempts to reason from the particular to the general. Never was a more colossal libel invented that this charge of wholesale falsehood preferred against American and English missionaries. Among all sorts and conditions of men there are none whose general level rises to a higher standard of scrupulous integrity. If Sir HIRAM MAXIM believes in the truth of his own accusation he must have wholly sacrificed his discernment upon the altar of his inventive faculties. His address was an outrage, as is its endorsement by the Japan Herald. As for the latter, it has the supreme effrontery to write:—“Truth in fact is higher than all forms of religion. It is a great mistake for missionaries to suppose they can either get to heaven themselves or lead others thither by telling lies." That is even more insulting than Sir HIRAM S. MAXIM's extravagance. The German section of this community are not to be congratulated upon their organ.

JAPAN AS A LAND OF TRAVEL.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 13.)

(COMMUNICATED).

IT appears that the Kyoto correspondent of the London Daily Chronicle has relieved himself of a number of more or less disparaging remarks with regard to Japan as a place of resort for foreign visitors. The tone of this bilious critic's observations is that of the unbelieving Jews of Galilee who asked, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" The scenery of Japan is mediocre; the hotels are bad; the advertising fiend is everywhere; the train service, always unreliable, is getting worse; Japanese architecture, with the possible exception of a temple or two, is not worth looking at; it is a fraud, a delusion and a snare to speak of the Japanese landscape as "a perennial feast of colour"—the flower-season, of which there is so much talk, is a fleeting dream; and should there be any tourist or visitor foolish enough to set foot in the land of the Rising Sun, he will speedily find himself the victim of "a system of organized spoliation." This is indeed melancholy reading, and one is led to wonder which of life's thousand ills has overtaken the Kyoto correspondent of the London journal that, from the heart of the most beautiful city of a beautiful country, he should pour forth this maledictory lament. We fancy that the average reader will, out of his charity, ascribe some such explanation for this farrago of wholesale condemnation, for are there not a hundred—entitled to at least as much consideration as this Kyoto scribe—who have spoken otherwise? We wonder, for example, what the intelligent Londoner, whose thoughts are drawn to this country by the great Exhibition now to be seen at Earl's Court, must think when, after a perusal of these jaundiced strictures, he takes up such a book as Mr. H. G. PONTING's latest on Japan. On such subjects at least as the scenery, the art, and the general charm of this country for the foreigner who first visits its shores, would the average man rather believe the verdict of a seasoned traveller who has journeyed from one end of the land to the other for the express purpose of searching out its scenic and artistic attractions, or would he swallow whole the tale of the Daily Chronicle's correspondent? This is Mr. PONTING's description of so ordinary, and at the same time familiar, a scene as the approach to Miyanoshta (we reproduce it in the fervent hope that the Kyoto correspondent may catch some of its nature-loving spirit and innate joie de vivre):—

"The scenery becomes finer at every turn as the road wind its way up the mountain-side. Rocky cliffs give way to maple woods, and then to bamboo-groves whose graceful shoots lean outwards, forming lovely canopies overhead. The Hayakawa fills the whole valley with the murmur of its waters, and down its banks and precipices many a streamlet tumbles headlong into the gorge below. The road is lovely at every season of the year. In April, "the cherry-tress are seas of bloom and soft perfume," sweet May then comes and makes the hillsides burn with red azaleasautumn sets the forests ablaze with fiery glory; and, "when winter's hand spreads wide her hoary mantle o'er the land," they are more beautiful than ever, for the feathery bamboos leaning across the road bow deeper still, weighted down with the snow that lies on their slender leaves and branches."

"Only to see Shoji, and the scenery at the sacred Fuji's foot," says Mr. PONTING, in another part of his book, "is worth the journey to far Japan Lakes forests, rivers and waterfalls succeed each other in quick succession, and always there are new and bewitching vistas of the grand mountain which dominates the background, each more beautiful than the one preceding it." But we need quote no more, nor is it necessary to say that Mr. PONTING is by no means alone in his eulogies. Many another traveller has written in like enthusiastic terms of Japanese scenery and of Japan as a holiday land. Fuji itself is generally conceded to be the most beautiful mountain in the world, and the possession of such a mountain alone greatly enhances Japan's claim to be a land of scenic attractions; but the special charm of Japanese scenery, in our opinion, is that it is characteristic, if not unique. For a variety of causes, the tout ensemble of the Japanese landscape produces an effect unlike that to be found, so far as we know, in any other country. The consequence is that, in spite of the Kyoto correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, the scenery of this country will continue to appeal to every visitor from the West who is blessed with the smallest sense of the aesthetic, or who can appreciate Nature in a garb at once new and fair. Furthermore, in the several departments of scenery, judged by the Occidental standard, Japan can hold her own with any country of similar size. The coast scenery of south-western Hokkaido, of Matsushima, of Kagoshima Bay; the mountain scenery of the Japanese Alps, of Nikko and the Kofu district—varied, as all Japanese mountain scenery is, by the numerous manifestations of volcanic force; the lake scenery of Central Yezo, Chuzenji and the Shoji district; the river scenery of the Shinano, the Katsuragawa, the Fujikawa and many another hill-girt stream—all these will bear comparison, in their respective features, with their cognate rivals of the West. We venture to predict that, if there is one aspect of Japan which is certain to show marked development in the near future—a development in which the continually increasing facilities for world-travel will play a prominent part—it is her unique capacity to serve as one of the holiday and health resorts of the world. As to the drawbacks to travel in Japan, of which the Kyoto correspondent complains, we hope to deal with these on another occasion.

II.

IN a previous article we ventured to protest against the apparently splenetic diatribes of the correspondent of a London journal, directed against this country as a land of travel. In that article, we concerned ourselves mainly with the wholesale and, in our opinion, quite unwarrantable disparagement of Japanese scenery in which that correspondent somewhat recklessly indulged. The appraisal of the comparative merits of a particular landscape may, and do, vary, according to the opinions of different authorities. It is largely a matter of temperament and of the conditions prevailing at the time. Thus, it is commonly said that the Scottish people dispute among themselves as to whether Loch Lomond or Loch Katrine shall be accounted the most beautiful of their lakes. Similarly, we venture to think, any conceivable tribunal of travelled experts would be divided against itself if called upon to assess, let us say, the respective merits of Fuji and the Jungfrau. It is probable that there will always be critics who prefer the typically Western landscape to the characteristically Japanese, despite the novelty which the latter has in its favour. But that is quite another thing from crying down the scenery of Japan, or damning it with diluted praise. Possibly the Kyoto correspondent of the London Chronicle hopes that, in the present ferment arising out of the new Tariff, condemnation of all things Japanese will find greedy appreciation in the land of Japan's Ally. Such a result appears to have been attained, in part at any rate, in certain of the Chinese treaty-ports, for we note that the North-China Daily News, a journal justly reputed for its impartiality and level-headedness, gives prominence, in its editorial columns, to the "very outspoken utterances" of the Kyoto correspondent, which it flatteringly describes as having created "no little sensation" in England. While our contemporary confesses that it "cannot agree with the correspondent in all his criticisms,—Kyoto itself supplies many instances to the contrary—it must be admitted that there is great justification for his strictures;" and proceeds to add:—

The proof of the expensiveness of travel in Japan is found every summer in the increasing number of residents in China who have abandoned Japan to seek some other place for their summer holiday. It is not too much to say that exactions to which the foreign visitor is exposed are becoming a byword, and there is little doubt that the Japanese hotel-keepers have already begun to feel the effects of public opinion in this respect very severely. The matter is one, of course, in which no single person can work an improvement. But with the prospects of the new tariff to raise the cost of living still further, those who provide for the entertainment of foreigners in Japan will have to look narrowly to their methods, if they would not altogether kill the goose that lays the golden eggs.

Now the sundry strictures passed by the Kyoto critic, scenery and works of art apart, were, in brief, first, the "vulgarizing" ubiquity of the "Japanese advertising-fiend;" secondly, the "always indifferent, and now steadily deteriorating, train-service;" and, finally, "the system of organized spoliation"—organized, presumably, between the exorbitant inn-keeper and the unscrupulous guide—which tourists are certain to encounter. The first of these charges is at once paltry and invidious. Objectionable though the practice may be on aesthetic grounds, what civilized country on earth is free from the taint of the advertiser? Is England? Is America? Why is this sin specially to be laid to the charge of Japan, where it exists on a far less extensive and "vulgar" scale? Then there is the train-service. Has any one set up for the railway-system of Japan, where such a thing as a railway was unknown a generation ago, the claim of perfection? Is it reasonable to complain, if travelling on Japanese railways is not fully up to the standard of England or the Continent? Is it unreasonable to maintain that, in consideration of all the circumstances attendant upon the introduction of this means of locomotion in an Oriental country—and one which, by reason of its physical conformation, presents great difficulties from the engineering point of view—the railway system of Japan is one of which she has reason to be proud, rather than to be ashamed? There is one circumstance, we note, in this context, that the Kyoto complainant was careful to omit in descanting on the cost of travel in Japan. We refer to the excessive cheapness of the railway fares, as compared with those of other more "advanced" countries. A Londoner wishing to travel to Southampton must pay, say seven shillings for a third-class ride. A foreigner in Japan can travel from Tokyo to Nikko, an approximately equal distance, by second-class, for something like half the cost.

As to the "system of organized spoliation," we have no hesitation in saying that there is very little organization about it. The Japanese inn-keeper and guide, like any other inn-keeper and guide, may on occasion take advantage of the ignorance or gullibility of his foreign client; but the extent to which any such "spoliation" is possible depends in no small measure upon the tourist himself. Can not the foreign visitor first acquaint himself with the cost of such services and, if they appear to him excessive, make other arrangements? A very little elementary knowledge of the conditions of travel in Japan, obtained from a foreign resident or from so excellent a vade mecum as Murray's Handbook, should enable the average visitor to dispense with the services of a guide, except for some specific purpose. As to hotels, if the tourist keeps to the beaten tracks, he will have little to regret. The hotel accommodation afforded in such places as Nikko and Miyonoshita—and, we might add, Kyoto itself—is comparable for general excellence and comfort with that obtainable in the popular resorts of the West. With regard to the travelling expenses of the tourist in this country we note that, in the handbook to which we have referred, the sum of yen 12 per day, inclusive, is allowed as an average. However, there is little doubt that the careful traveller could effect a substantial reduction on that figure. If he were to place more reliance on himself and less on a hired guide, if he did not confine himself to the stereotyped routes, nor scorn to avail himself, on occasion, of the Japanese inn, he could roam this country from one end of it to the other for half that daily expenditure, with ever-increasing satisfaction to himself. Japan has its drawbacks, we admit, but they are slight, and by no means insurmountable. For the rest, as a land of travel,—a health-resort endowed by Nature with a special degree of attractiveness—its capacities, so far from being exhausted, are only beginning to be understood.

AN APPARENT SETBACK FOR JAPANESE COLOURPRINTS.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL")

The craze for these prints, which seemingly reached its spring tide level at the sale of the now famous Happer Collection in the Spring of 1909 at the Rooms of Messrs. Sotheby Wilkinson and Hodge in London, appears to be somewhat on the wane, judging by the prices in the illustrated Catalogue of the sale of Mr. Paul Blondeau's Collection this Spring by the aforementioned well known Auctioneers.

At the Happer Auction, described by the London Times as "this remarkable sale," 708 Lots realized just over £6000, while a year later the proceeds of a little over 400 Lots of Mr. Blondeau's Collection, fell just short of a total of £1100 although, judging by the description of the latter's prints in his Catalogue, there must have been some very fine specimens amongst them.

While it is of course very difficult at this distance, and without having seen the specimens in the respective collections, to draw an accurate conclusion from the prices realised, and the merits of the prints sold; or to account for the enormous difference in catalogue prices, still it might be useful to present in a parallel form the prices obtained at these respective sales, for prints by the self same artists. The deductions drawn therefrom may not be conclusive, but it may set Collectors in this country pondering over the apparent mystery about the value of Japanese Colourprints, as illustrated in the two sales abovementioned, and to put them on their guard against indiscriminate buying on the strength of artist's names only:—space forbids to enumerate all the artists whose works were put up for sale, but we give hereunder some of the best known ones in this branch of Japanese xylography.

BLONDEAU COLLECTION SPRING SALE 1910.

Shoki The Demon Queller £55.
3 Prints ranging from 15 Sh. to £2.2.

In all 44 Nos. ranging from £1.5 to £50. the last named price being paid for the complete "Marriage set" of 7 oblong prints. Very rare.—Many numbers amongst these 44 lots being described as: "in beautiful condition";—"A very fine specimen"; "probably unique," "in beautiful state"; and so on. The total lot of 44 Nos. realizing nevertheless only £251.2.

10 Lots ranging in price from 16 Sh. up to £22. the last named price being paid for what is described as: "a very celebrated triptych, but one sheet faulty."—Total proceeds £48.11.

In all 84 Nos. ranging from 7 Sh. up to £10. 5 out of the complete set of 10 prints forming "The Imagery of the Poets" fetching only £10.4 while the total proceeds of the 84 Nos amounted to a little over £95.

In all 30 Nos. ranging from 16 Sh. up to £22. this last price being paid for "Two Hares," while the next highest price £18.10 was paid for "Two Pheasants."—The total for the 30 Nos realised a fraction over £156.

In all 36 Nos. ranging from 6 Sh. up to £3. this last price having been paid for what is described as: "a very beautiful and delicate print."—Total proceeds exceeded £30 by a fraction.

A total of 42 Nos. ranging from 13 Sh. to £8. the last price being paid for 4 sheets from the notable Pentaptych; "Clearing up for the new year."—Total proceeds £84. or, on an average £2 per number.

3 Nos. ranging from 9s. up to £2.2.

12 Nos. ranging in price from 18s. up to £8 the last named figure being paid for a print called "Toyohino," being one of the series: "Beauties of the 3 Provinces."—Total proceeds £35.11.

Eight Lots ranging from 17 Sh. up to £3.5.—Total proceeds amounting to £16.7.

Only 2 Nos. one "a view of Mount Asama" fetching £3 and the other: "The Great Carp" realizing only £8.15 and described as: "a very fine copy of one of the most celebrated works of Yeisen."

A First Edition of this self same print realized only £5 while the proceeds of the entire 62 Lots amounted to £106.11 although having many "First Editions amongst them, evidently all good and genuine specimens, some even being described as "very rare."

Now, how are we to account for the difference in price between two prints by Shigenaga, where in 1909 £37 is being paid for the portrait of "an Actor," while a year later that of a "Demon-Queller" fetches only 5 Guineas and at which price it could not have been an inferior production.

Or is there any plausible explanation for the fact that 5 prints by Suzuki Harunobu realised at the Happer Sale almost as much as the total proceeds of 44 by the same artist at the Blondeau Sale a year later, particularly in view of their eulogistic description in the catalogue?

Two prints by Kiyonaga realize in 1909 nearly 20 per cent. more than the aggregate amount obtained a year later for 10 of them at the Blondeau Sale. When we come to the prices paid for Hokusai's the difference in values realised is even more glaring. At the Happer Sale £1000. was paid for the complete set of "The Imagery of the Poets," while only a hundredth part of this figure could be obtained for half the set at the Blondeau Sale; the entire number of 84 Lots at the last named sale averaging not quite £2.6.5 per lot. Koriyasai's works seem to have fared more equally at both auctions although it is significant that 1 print out of the 30 Lots put up at the Blondeau Sale, realized nearly 25 per cent. of the total proceeds of this parcel.

That two prints by Shunsho should have realized £38 at the Happer Sale, while only £3 could be credited as the proceeds of 36 of them at the Blondeau auction a year latter, would seem to be another riddle for the experts to solve.

The enormous disparity in values obtained at these respective auctions is perhaps best illustrated in Utamaro's prints, for where Blondeau obtains £84 as the total proceeds of 42 Nos. which at that price must have been genuine, Happer realizes nearly half this amount for a single print only a year before the Blondeau Auction.

Even more striking is the difference in prices for Yeiss's prints, an artist deservedly sought after by connoisseurs and collectors—; Mr. Happer getting £34 for his: "Prince Genji at a Garden-party;" where Mr. Blondeau succeeds a year later, in obtaining only £35.11 for 12 Nos. by this Artist.

This same disparity is maintained with regard to values obtained for the work of Shuncho. Mr. Happer clearing £22 for a single specimen, and Mr. Blondeau realising £16.7 as the proceeds of 8 lots.

But the climax is reached when we come to the sale of works by Yeisen and Hiroshige.—A copy of "The Great Carp" by Yeisen fetches at the Happer sale £25, while only a year later Mr. Blondeau has to be satisfied with £8.15 for what the catalogue describes as "A very fine Copy," of this same subject by the same artist.

Worse luck however was in store for Mr. Blondeau with his collection of Hiroshige's, which realised £106.11 for the 62 lots sold, amongst them a first edition of "Kiso Mountains under Snow," which fetched £5, while his more successful rival obtained the year before £22 for a copy of the same subject by the same artist.

Granting the superiority in every respect of Mr. Happer's collection over that of Mr. Blondeau, and with every allowance made for the more judicious advertising of the former, and the more artistic and scientific get up of Mr. Happer's collection, there would still appear to be a considerable margin left for surprise on the part of the average collector of colourprints, at the enormous difference in prices obtained, for it must never be forgotten, that however great the technical skill displayed in colourprints, they remain, after all, mechanical products, so that it must be difficult to understand a difference like 300 and 400 per cent. in price (as at the above sales) for first editions of prints by the self same masters.

The cause is evidently not to be found in a different class of public at the respective sales, for amongst the buyers at both auctions one comes across the same names of such well known collectors as Sir Frank Swettenham; Foster; Paterson; Lee; Fisher; Gibson; Wilson; Vignier; James; Tregaskis; Capel; Hall; Glass; Harland; S. Smith; Yamanaka; Mada; Kato and others, who must be supposed to know what they were buying. One is therefore forced to the conclusion that the fever which existed at the earlier of the two sales had considerably abated by the time Mr. Blondeau's auction was held, or that the fact of reproductions of Mr. Happer's prints at the latter sale had robbed these of their value of supposed rarity, which plays such an important part in the commercial value of all works of art, constituting but too often a miserable exhibition of snobbery.

It will be difficult to predict what the future has in store for this particular branch of Japanese xylography in the artistic realms of the occident, and whether the prices paid so far for specimens by well known artists, have already reached their zenith, or if they will not soar sky-high in a not far distant future. They have been treated "au grand sérieux" by the most famous art critics, amongst whom De Goncourt should occupy the most honoured place, and been given an established position in the ranks of oriental art, so that it is unlikely that they can be looked upon as a passing phase, but the most serious danger which they have been and are still encountering, is the fashionable element which has invaded the legitimate enthusiasm evoked by their appearance in occidental art circles. Like the craze for "Old Masters"; "Antique Furniture"; "Old Delft or China," or similar fashionable hobby, Japanese Colour prints seem to have "caught on," and local residents indulging in a modest way in the collection thereof must have become aware in recent times how the craze for these works of art has affected the local market. Under the stimulating influence of the great demand for them, especially by American visitors to these shores, prices have mounted by leaps and bounds, and quite naturally so where the genuine article is concerned, but the latter quality has become so scarce, that it is probably no exaggeration to say, that of all the specimens offered for sale in these latitudes, fully 75 per cent. if not more, is composed of late reproductions by means of aniline dyes, and often absolutely worthless, from a collector's point of view, while real old prints manufactured by the thousand only yesterday, are palmed off on the unsophisticated tourist as the genuine thing. It's no use blaming the bunco steerers and gold-brick swindlers amongst the Curio dealers. Like the brethren of their guild in every other part of the globe, they are firm believers in Mundus vult decipi, ergo decipiatur; "the tourist argues that Japanese Colourprints can only be bought in Japan, where he will get the genuine article at the correct price, and if he is offered a real Sharaku"; "allesame Mr. Happer collection," why should he doubt the enterprising salesman?—as a matter of fact he doesn't, and it's not the business of the curiodealer to inform him that he pays 30 yen for a print costing 45 sen. But he has no right to complain when he has been enlightened on his return home, that he has been robbed; he has had the experience of hundreds in his own country who after having spent thousands of dollars on real antique curios here, found that they were worthless, the principal cause of the decline in the curiotrade locally! and if they stop buying "old lacquer, or antique porcelain" to-day they will buy crystal globes, or Japanese colourprints to-morrow, but always on the same terms.

And no wonder, even local residents on pointing out the absurd difference in price between an identical colourprint in two different shops will be gravely met by a: "this one different quality," or with an equally weighty brass ingot hurled at him, from the inexhaustible mine of oriental resourcefulness, with the result, that he either succumbs under the force of such an impact, or that it drives him from the premises. Locally, or in fact all over Japan at present, there is no standard of value for prints by the best known artists; they partake of the character of curios, and as such are worth what a fool will give for them; but in Europe one would have thought that something like a standard had ere now been established for the great masters in that art; with the results of the auctions under discussion before us, one hesitates however to appraise even approximately the value of the respective artists or their work from a commercial point of view, and there are evidently a multiplicity of points to be considered in connection with their market value, before one is enabled to pronounce a verdict and to assign them their proper status.

If it was a question of some kakemono, piece of lacquer, netzuke, a tsuba, or some other art production from the hand of a famous master in those art and crafts, one could sooner understand a fancy price being paid for creations having the great desideratum of being unique, as a replica of any of these, however well executed, could never possess the same value as the original. But in colourprints, of which it is known that great quantities were struck off from the same block, it is difficult to conceive a difference in finish of two original editions (presumably editions struck off at the same time from the same block), sufficiently important to account for a difference of from 300 to 400 per cent. in value. Perhaps some local expert may be able and willing to solve these apparent riddles.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent)

St. Petersburg, June 23.

Two cases of cholera have now been officially acknowledged at St. Petersburg after post mortem and bacteriological examinations. The cases occurred in different quarters of the city, and one was a recent arrival from, it is said, Persia. Doctors assert that many suspected cases that have been under treatment for weeks past in the hospitals showed the cholera vibron in many instances, but not in the form or quantity sufficient to produce true cholera in the person attacked. Moreover it is suggested that the inhabitants of St. Petersburg have been rendered somewhat immune from ordinary attacks of cholera owing to having lived with the disease so long. The public recognise the efforts of these medical opinions to restore confidence but place much more trust in the continuance of the cold snap that set in last week after a period of sultry weather.

The Novoe Vremya reports that the Government has prepared a Bill, for introduction to the Duma, dealing with the question of German encroachment on the Western Provinces of Russia. It will be remembered that very warm speeches were made last session in the Duma on the subject of German exploitation of the Western Province, where Germans not only held enormous tracts of land, especially about the fortresses and all strategic military points, in some cases these naturalised Germans amounting to half the population, but had been allowed, if not encouraged to organise semi-military rifle clubs etc. on German models. These clubs even held reviews at which only the absence of a military uniform and leaders differentiated them from regular troops. It was further stated that those German colonists on becoming Russian subjects, while enjoying all the privileges given by Russia to her own people, lost none of those appertaining to German subjects, and were, in fact, treated and regarded by Berlin as an advance guard of her own nationals.

It is rumoured to-night that M. Schwarz, the Minister of Education will shortly be compelled to resign owing to the dissatisfaction his conduct of his office has aroused on more than one occasion. The scandalous orders concerning the Russian women-students will not have been forgotten: the interference of the Emperor was needed to stop the ill-advised measures advocated by this Minister, who expelled from the Universities women-students who had entered regularly and in order, under his Predecessors, and were in many cases almost at the end of their University career. It is now alleged that M. Schwarz has failed to give satisfaction to high circles by his new proposals for the "reform" in a reactionary spirit of the Universities in general and the secondary schools. Needless to say his proposals have not met with any approval from Russians generally.

The Automobile endurance test in connection with the Exhibition at St. Petersburg will begin at 10 a.m. on June 29th, the start being from Tsarskoe Selo. Over fifty motor-cars have so far entered, of which 30 are from Germany, 10 from France, 5 from Italy, 4 from England, 3 Russian built and two from Belgium. The route is from Tsarskoe Selo via Vitebsk to Kiev, where a day will be spent in speed races among the competitors. From Kiev the return will be made via Moscow and another day will be spent there in speed races. In all probability the route back may include Peterhof, to arrive in St. Petersburg on July 12th. Among the competing cars is one belonging to His Majesty the Emperor, who took the Exhibition under his own patronage thereby defeating the combination of local car-dealers for foreign firms who endeavoured to prevent an Exhibition being held apparently on the ground that their business would be adversely affected by showing to Russian potential buyers new foreign makes.

M. Alexander Guchkov has resigned his post as President of the Duma in order to avoid laying upon the Duma the odium of having its President confined to a fortress. M. Guchkov being under a sentence of this kind for having fought a duel with Count Uvarov. As in any case there will be a new election of President when the Duma reassembles, M. Guchkov's decision will not mean his loss in that position to the Duma. His views on duelling are that it is unavoidable in Russia in present circumstances, but none the less the parties to a duel ought in his opinion to be punished. He prefers to take his punishment as M. Guchkov rather than as President of the Duma.

Russian workmen transferred to the Far East for excavation operations on the Amur Railway are reported to be deserting en masse. The territory was surveyed in mid-Winter when it is frozen six feet deep and the workmen now find they are called upon to deal with rock and bog unexpectedly.

WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

AN ASSEMBLY UNPRECEDENTED IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The World Missionary Conference, for which preparations of the most elaborate character have been in progress for two years, assembled in Edinburgh on June 14. Twelve hundred specially appointed delegates and nearly three thousand other visitors interested in foreign missions will for the next ten days crowd the largest halls in the Scottish capital for the discussion of the various problems connected with missionary work. But even more remarkable than the large number in attendance is the personnel of the Conference and its unprecedentedly representative character. Every conference is in danger of exaggerating its own importance, but in this particular case it is generally conceded by outsiders that the entire history of the Christian church affords no parallel to it either in immediate significance or in its tremendous potentialities.

In order that the various problems to be discussed might be brought before the Conference in the most practical form, nine Commissions, comprising nearly 200 of the most competent authorities in Europe and America, have been engaged for the past eighteen months in sifting some thousands of individual reports received from missionaries and other foreign residents of non-Christian countries relative to the particular difficulties encountered in the various missionary fields. These Commissions have included among their members not only Church dignitaries and educationists, but a large number of men distinguished in public life, such as Lord Balfour of Burleigh, Sir Andrew Fraser (ex-Lieut.-Governor of Bengal), Sir Ernest Satow, Hon. Seth Low, of New York, and Admiral Mahan, U.S.N. Each Commission has issued a voluminous but thoroughly digested report on some one particular phase of the missionary problem, and to each report one day's discussion will be devoted.

The 1,200 special delegates comprise some 500 from the United States, 450 from the United Kingdom, 150 from the Continent of Europe, and 100 from Japan, China, India, Africa, Canada, Australia and other parts of the world.

The British delegates include the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Bishops of Durham, Salisbury, Hereford, Ripon, Birmingham, Southwark, Brechin, Aberdeen, Meath, and Ossory; Lords Balfour of Burleigh, Reay, Kinnaid, Polworth, and Blythwood; the Moderators of the Church of Scotland, the United Free Church, and the Presbyterian Church in England; the presidents of the various free churches, and many distinguished laymen, titled and untitled. The American contingent includes, in addition to many of the most prominent clergy and ministers of the country, the Hon. W. Jennings Bryan, who has twice visited the Far East, the Hon. Seth Low, ex-President of Columbia University and ex-Mayor of New York, and other well-known laymen interested in Foreign Missions. From Japan there are, among others, President Harada, Dr. J. D. Davis, and Dr. S. L. Gulick, of the Doshisha; Bishop Honda, President Ibuka, Professor E. W. Clement, Mr. Galen M. Fisher, and Rev. E. R. Miller, of Tokyo; Rev. G. C. Niven of Gifu; Rev. Yugoro Chiba, of Fukuoka, Rev. A. Pieters, of Nagasaki, Mrs. Bickersteth and Miss Dora Howard. Bishop Harris, so long connected with missionary work in Japan, is one of the delegates from Korea, with Dr. Jones, Mr. Yun Chi Ho (ex-Minister of Education) and others. Many of the principal churches and missionary organizations have called their prominent missionaries from the field to be present at the Conference, among those so summoned being Bishop Brent of the Philippines, Bishop Restarick of Honolulu, Bishop Roots of Hankow, Bishop Bashford of Peking, Bishop Oldham of Singapore, Bishop Robinson of Bombay, Dr. Timothy Richard of Shanghai, Dr. J. C. Gibson of Swatow, and Dr. A. H. Smith of Peking.

On the evening of June 13, the day preceding the formal opening of the Conference, a reception in honour of the delegates was given by the Lord Provost, Magistrates and Council of the City of Edinburgh, five thousand invitations being issued. Among the messages of greeting and goodwill received on this occasion was a very cordial one from the German Colonial Office.

The opening meeting, held on the following day, strikingly emphasised the international character of the assembly, many of the Oriental delegates wearing the costumes of their respective countries.

The first conference session in the Assembly Hall was very brief. Lord Balfour of Burleigh was in the chair, supported by Sir John Kennaway, Sir Andrew Fraser, the Hon. Seth Low, and others. Only routine business necessary for formally constituting the Conference was undertaken. Mr. J. H. Oldham and Mr. J. R. Mott were nominated as secretary of the Conference and chairman of committees respectively.

Three interesting telegrams of greeting were received from the Dutch Church, the committee of the Church Missionary Society, and the Blantyre Mission in Nyassaland. This last message, which was handed in at Nyassaland in the morning, arrived just before the afternoon session.

An appropriate recognition of the importance of the Conference was the conferment by the University of Edinburgh of honorary degrees on a number of representative delegates. The ceremony took place in the McEwan Hall, the recipients of the degree of Doctor of Divinity being presented by Professor Patrick, Dean of the Faculty of Divinity, and those for the degree of Doctor of Laws by Sir Ludovic Grant.

The selection of the delegates to be thus honoured afforded a striking demonstration of the services rendered to education, literature and civil government by missionaries and those closely identified with the missionary movement. It was significant that of the distinguished group who received degrees, the two who had the greatest ovation were Mr. R. E. Speer and Mr. J. R. Mott, both of whom have devoted the greater part of their lives to work among students.

The most striking figure was that of General James A. Beaver, ex-Governor of Pennsylvania, who was wounded three times in the Civil War in America. He proceeded slowly to the dais, his one remaining leg reinforced by crutches. President Harada, of the Doshisha, received a hearty welcome, his reference to the drawing together of East and West evoking an enthusiastic response.

Those presented for the degree of Doctor of Divinity were the Rev. K. C. Chatterji, of India; the Rev. W. Douglas MacKenzie, President of Hartford Theological Seminary, U.S.A.; the Rev. F. L. Hawks Pott, Principal of St. John's College, Shanghai; Pastor Julius Richter, of Germany; Canon C. H. Robinson, editorial secretary of the S.P.G.; Mr. R. E. Speer, secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, U.S.A.; the Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson, secretary of the London Missionary Society; and Herr J.

Warneck, foreign secretary of the Rhenish Missionary Society. The new Doctors of Law are the Archbishop of Canterbury; General James A. Beaver, Judge of the Superior Court, Pennsylvania; the Rev. Tasuku Harada, president of the Doshisha College, Kyoto, Japan; the Hon. Seth Low, president of Columbia University, New York; Professor Karl Meinhof, professor of African languages at the Colonial Institute, Hamburg, and Mr. J. R. Mott, general secretary of the World's Student Christian Federation. At the close of the graduation, short speeches were invited from the new graduates, on whose behalf Dr. Richter, Dr. Harada, Dr. Seth Low, and Dr. Mott addressed the assembly.

The most interesting feature of the evening meeting, held in the Assembly Hall, was the reading of a message from the King, delivered on his behalf by Lord Balfour of Burleigh. After an expression of the King's deep interest in the proceedings of the Conference, the message continued:

"His Majesty views with gratification the fraternal cooperation of so many churches and societies in the United States, on the Continent of Europe and in the British Empire in the work of disseminating the knowledge and principles of Christianity by Christian methods throughout the world. The King appreciates the supreme importance of this work in its bearing upon the cementing of international friendship, the cause of peace, and the well-being of mankind. His Majesty welcomes the prospect of this great representative gathering being in one of the capitals of the United Kingdom, and expresses his earnest hope that the deliberations of the Conference may be guided by divine wisdom, and may be a means of promoting unity among Christians, and of furthering the high and beneficent ends which the Conference has in view."

The reading of the message was received with loud applause, followed by the singing of the National Anthem, and the executive committee was charged with the framing of a suitable reply.

II.

The proceedings of the first day's Conference were brought to a close by an extremely weighty and earnest address from the Archbishop of Canterbury and a vigorous and eloquent speech from Mr. R. E. Speer, of New York.

But so large a portion of the first day's proceedings had been given up to the formalities connected with the opening of the Conference and to the ceremony at the University that it was not until the morning of the second day, June 15, that the delegates really settled down to work. Then it was that the practical character of the preliminary work done by the various Commissions was first realized, Dr. John R. Mott, Chairman of the Commission on "Carrying the Gospel to all the non-Christian World," needing only to touch in the briefest manner upon the salient points of the report, a copy of it having been placed in the hands of each delegate. The importance of concerted action on the part of the various missionary organizations of the world, of all churches and all countries, the prompt recognition of which was one of the most striking of the early features of the Conference, was first urged in this report, and enforced by the tremendous fact that there are still 114 millions of people that are wholly outside even the nominal sphere of Christian missions.

Dr. Robson, vice-chairman of the Commission, dealt with the situation in Africa, with its 500 different languages and 300 additional dialects, and the powerful Mohammedan propaganda which is out-distancing the efforts of the Christian missionaries. Every Mohammedan trader is a missionary of Islam and if pagan Africa is to be Christianized it can only be by an immediate and large addition to the missionary forces of the Continent. Dr. Karl Kumm, of the Soudan Mission, emphasised the same danger, as did also Swiss and other European missionaries.

The situation in Asia brought up an interesting discussion. The Rev. Yugoro Chiba, of Fukuoka, Japan, spoke of the small number of avowed Japanese Christians, stating that mission workers had touched only the middle classes of the country, very little having been done among farmers and working men generally. The native Christians were doing their best, but they had to contend not only with the keen intellect of the Orient, but with the Oriental intellect stimulated by Western philosophies.

Dr. J. D. Davis, of the Doshisha, Kyoto, while enumerating some of the encouraging signs of the times in Japan, acknowledged that it was still a problem whether the country was to be swayed by materialism, agnosticism or Christianity.

Bishop Bashford, of Peking, having spoken of the industrial and educational transition through which China is passing, Professor Tong Tsing-en, of Shanghai, said that while education was unquestionably loosening the hold of the people on their ancient superstitions, they were not yet accepting in any numbers any new form of faith. He added that it was his belief that the next three years would see the difficulties of Christian work in China greatly increased and he besought the Conference to deal boldly and liberally with the existing situation.

Mr. T. H. Yon, ex-Minister of Education in Korea, declared that the Bible is to-day the most widely read book in that country. But a revivification of the ancient religions was still a possibility and there should be a redoubling of Christian effort.

Among the speakers on the needs of India was the Rev. V. S. Azariah, of the Indian National Missionary Association, who described India as the neglected continent, there being districts with populations of from two to three millions without any Christian workers. Personal testimony followed as to conditions in Mongolia, Afghanistan, Chinese and Eastern Turkestan, Brazil and Polynesia.

At the afternoon session a touching appeal was made by a German missionary for patience with native converts who did not attain to the full measure of the Christian life. Bishop Robinson, of Bombay, declared the greatest need of India to be a powerful apologetic to show to the higher castes the superiority of Christianity as a spiritual force. Bishop Roots, of Hankow, emphasised the importance of native evangelistic agencies, which he declared to be the most effective of all. Greater care in the selection of native evangelists than was sometimes exercised was, however, pointed out by the Director of the China Inland Mission (Mr. D. E. Hoste) as highly essential.

Dr. Eugene Stock said that to Uganda not a single penny of English money had ever gone to support the work of the hundreds of native agents, but he saw no reason why native churches in other non-Christian countries should not be assisted by churches in England, America or Germany. Dr. Ross, of Manchuria, stated that of 30,000 native Christians in that country not more than 100 came into the church through the direct efforts of foreign missionaries. The temples were falling into ruin or being converted into Government schools. It was no exaggeration to say that idolatry was dead. Three crowded evening meetings, open to the public, brought the second day's proceedings to a close.

The third day's business opened with the reading of a letter from ex-President Roosevelt, who had been elected a delegate, but was unable to remain in Europe to participate in the proceedings. The dominant note of the letter was that "a divided Christendom can only imperfectly bear witness to the essential unity of Christianity," a fact which the Conference seems to recognize more keenly with each succeeding session. Mention may be made here of another letter that has almost escaped public attention, although read to the Conference on the 16th inst. It was a letter from the Roman Catholic Bishop of Cremona, applauding the Conference and expressing an intense desire for Christian unity. This prelate is understood to be an intimate friend of the Pope.

The topic for the day was the report of Commission No. 2 on "The Church in the Mission Field," introduced by Dr. J. C. Gibson, of South China, in one of the most striking addresses of the Conference. Dr. Gibson declared that the foundation of a native church simply laid upon the church at home fresh responsibilities and enormously larger tasks, in the training of native pastors and the nurture of a church life that has to be lived in a non-Christian atmosphere and without those Christian traditions which are so helpful to the church in England and America. How need they wonder, he asked, if the native Christian sometimes stumbles. Dr. A. J. Brown, Secretary of the Foreign Missions Board of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, was another speaker whose utterances displayed a breadth of view completely belying much that we are sometimes asked to believe as to the attitude of missionaries and missionary officials towards the native churches. Dr. Hume, of India, advocated the organization of native churches on distinctly national lines. This brought up Bishop Honda, of Tokyo, who said that the national spirit was closely involved with the idea of independence and responsibility, and that so far as Japan was concerned missionaries who ignored or violated the national spirit were only courting disaster, while any apparent denationalization on the part of Christian converts would surely bring upon them persecution. A native Chinese pastor entirely supported by his congregation also spoke strongly in favour of an autonomous native church. The Rev. W. N. Bitton, of Shanghai, said that one of the greatest hindrances to the success of missions in China was a feeling on the part of the Chinese that the foreign connections of the missionary societies were opposed to the highest interests of the country. After other speakers, Bishop Gore, of Birmingham, said that the more true it was that the autonomy of native churches should be fostered, the more important it became that the really essential elements of Christianity should be emphasised and defined. Following upon speeches dealing with conditions in other parts of the world, Mrs. Bickersteth, of Japan, gave some interesting details as to the training of Japanese evangelists, and of the important work being done by Japanese Christian women.

The session concluded with an important discussion of the question of polygamy in relation to the Christian church in non-Christian lands, a question upon which there appeared to be greater difference of opinion than upon any other so far considered. Some of the delegates and some of the missionaries, from whom the Commission had received reports, took the extreme view that no convert should be accepted until he had first dissolved all polygamous relationships, and made such provision as might be practicable for the remarriage or at least the guardianship and maintenance of the wives put away. Others argued that polygamy is everywhere gradually dying out, that the dismissal of plural wives would in many cases drive them to immoral living, and that while polygamy should in every case be condemned as a violation of the law of Christ, the sin should be regarded as having been committed in ignorance and the relation as one that could not now be undone without still greater wrong. No attempt was made to reconcile these conflicting opinions, but it was stated on behalf of the Commission that there was a manifest tendency on the part of missionaries who had held the more extreme views to reconsider their position.

The difficulties of the caste system in India were impressively set forth by the Rev. J. A. Sharrock, who stated that even Christian converts of different castes would not intermarry.

At an auxiliary meeting held while the ordinary afternoon session was in progress, Dr. Davis, of Kyoto, expressed his belief that the foreign workers in Japan would willingly adjust themselves to the new situation that was arising in that country, and not only work shoulder to shoulder with the Japanese Christians, but even let them be the leaders. He frankly acknowledged the small advance that had been made, and urged such a strengthening of the various Christian schools as would enable them to compete successfully with the educational institutions established by the Government. Dr. Davis stated that he had been requested by the Prime Minister of Japan to express to the Conference Japan's deep sense of indebtedness for the assistance given her by Western nations and her earnest desire for peace.

A rich vein of humour running through the entire address of Dr. A. H. Smith, of Peking, did not disguise the serious import of his speech on the political, social and ethical problems now pressing for solution. Professor Tong Tsing-en, of Shanghai, said that for twenty-four years after Morrison's arrival in China, he, Morrison, could get no one to listen to him, but that there are now a quarter of a million Chinese Christians are more than twelve times as many as Morrison ventured to predict as the result of a hundred years' work. He said that in Shanghai there were at least five self-sustaining native churches, and the spirit of responsibility and independence was spreading on all hands.

The proceedings of the fourth day were devoted to "Education in relation to the Christianization of the National Life," a topic on which the would-be speakers far exceeded the number that could possibly be heard in one day, notwithstanding the rigorous application of the seven-minute rule. One of the most notable speeches was that of Professor Sadler, of the University of Manchester, one of the highest living authorities on education. He stated that the educational science of England and America had paid far too little heed to the experience of the mission field, which would be found of great value even in countries possessing elaborate educational systems. Bishop Gore said that piety and devotion were not the only qualifications necessary to a successful missionary in the present day. He must be able to teach. Sir Andrew Fraser, ex-Lieut. Governor of Bengal, said there was a great cry throughout India for religious education. Hindus and Mohammedans were calling for it, and it could not be given except on the present system. The discussion was continued by prominent educationists from India, by President Bergen, of Shantung University, who urged the importance of special efforts to reach the higher class Chinese, and President Ibuka and Prof. Clement, of Tokyo. Dr. Gulick, of the Doshisha, and Miss Dora Howard, the last named dwelling upon the importance of a thorough acquaintance with the prevailing religions of Japan on the part of Christian workers going out to that country.

The Hon. W. J. Bryan, thrice Democratic candidate for the presidency of the United States, testified as a layman, who had visited nearly all the world's principal mission fields, to the importance both of the evangelistic and the educational work in which the missionaries were engaged. He referred to the very small cost of the educational facilities provided by the missionary organizations, which he stated to be in China about thirty dollars per annum for a girl and fifty dollars for a boy, the sums mentioned including board. He believed that a general knowledge of how cheaply children could be provided with a good Christian education in non-Christian lands would lead to a large increase in the funds available for that purpose. "Men talk about a yellow peril," said Mr. Bryan, in conclusion. "There is only one yellow peril and that is the lust of gold."

In the evening all the principal halls of the city were occupied with public meetings. With the eloquence that has made him so famous, Mr. Bryan addressed a large and distinguished audience in the Assembly Hall of the Church of Scotland, basing his address on the words in the Apocalypse, "The tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." Mr. Bryan held his audience spell-bound for an hour and a half, and to none of them is his extraordinary power over vast popular assemblies any longer a mystery.

III.

After the adoption of a reply to the message from the King, the Conference proceeded on the fifth day of its deliberations to the consideration of the Missionary Message in Relation to non-Christian Lands, in which connection it is worthy of note that the word "heathen" has no place in the printed records of the Conference and is almost never heard even in its oral discussions. Almost every speaker on the report of Commission No. 4 acknowledged that there is a deposit of truth in every religion and that it is the business of the missionary not to destroy but to build up. There was also remarkable unanimity in the testimony from widely separated mission fields that the teaching that most appeals to the followers of other religious faiths is that of the Fatherhood of God and the personality of Christ. This also recalls a striking remark made by no less pronounced an ecclesiastic than the Bishop of Birmingham that neither the Thirty-nine Articles nor the Westminster Confession had any place in the mission field.

After a discussion of animistic religions, participated in mainly by missionaries from Africa, the Conference again turned to China and Japan, the position of Japan being dealt with by Rev. G. C. Niven, of Gifu, President Harada, of Kyoto, and Mr. Galen M. Fisher, of Tokyo. Dr. Harada said that it was of the utmost importance to show the Japanese people that they could be loyal Christians and Japanese at the same time, the idea that Christianity is a foreign religion being a fatal handicap to its progress. Dr. Gibson, of Peking, referred to that magnificent conception of God, the old worship of Shanti, performed only by the Emperor himself on State occasions. He said Christians should go to China, not to preach a foreign deity, but to interpret to the Chinese the great God of their fathers. Great applause greeted a very able exposition by a native Chinese delegate of the high qualities of Buddhism and Confucianism, and of the fact that each of them sets a standard which it was essential that Christianity should be shown to surpass.

A word of warning that the apparent break-up of Hinduism might only prelude a reformation that would make it more formidable than ever was uttered by Brother Western, of Delhi, who, attired in brown robe and girdle, and with his bare feet encased in sandals and a large cross on his breast, was one of the most striking figures of the Conference. Professor MacEwen, New College, [Edinburgh], said that while there must always be a radical antagonism between the beliefs of Christianity and those of Paganism, the failure of certain promising missions both in China and Japan was unquestionably due to the attitude of their missionaries towards the native religions. So much for the regular sessions of the fifth day.

The evening meetings not only give the public an opportunity of seeing and hearing some of the distinguished visitors, but they are distinctly supplementary to the regular sessions, which might almost be doubled in length without lack of competent speakers. At one of the Saturday evening meetings the Rev. E. R. Miller, of Tokyo, said that the fact that the business morality of the Japanese was not as high as it ought to be was just as distinctly recognized by the Government of Japan as by those who were daily calling attention to it, and that this evil, together with the social evil and temperance reform, furnished a wide field for Christian activity. He added that to leave the Japanese churches entirely to their own resources would be to impose upon them a crushing burden. At the same meeting Bishop Harris said he prayed that the Anglo-Japanese alliance might last to the end of time, as one of the agencies by which God would draw Japan, as He assuredly was doing, unto Himself. President Ibuka said that while a great task had still to be performed, Christianity was gradually moulding and transforming the ideas of the Japanese nation. At another meeting, presided over by the Hon. Seth Low, of New York, the addresses dealt with the relation of missions to education and commerce.

No deliberative sessions were held on Sunday, but in addition to special sermons being preached in 160 churches, several large meetings were held, two of them being addressed by the Archbishop of York and one by President Harada.

The report of Commission No. 7, on the Relation of Missions to Governments, was taken out of its regular order, being considered on Monday, June 20. It was a remarkable tribute to the freedom of religion that exists in Japan that neither the report nor the discussion based upon it was in any way concerned with that country, beyond the statement that were the relations of missions to governments as satisfactory in every other country as they are in Japan, this particular Commission would not have been called into existence. Altogether different, however, is the situation in China. In that empire a vacillating and sometimes oppressive governmental policy has greatly increased the difficulties attending missionary enterprise, and Chinese native Christians labour under certain serious legal disabilities. Then there is the vexed question of indemnities, with regard to which Taotai Tong so politely, but none the less plainly, reproached the missionary body at the Shanghai Conference three years ago. Perhaps the most serious matter dealt with in the report, however, was the favour sometimes shown to Mohammedanism at the expense of Christianity by the British Government. The reasons for such discrimination are not usually far to seek, but for an exclusively Christian and propagandist body like the Conference they possess little or no validity. The opium traffic and the Congo atrocities were also included in this day's proceedings, the whole being left to the jurisdiction of the Permanent Committee whose formation was regarded as one of the most important duties of the Conference. Lest it should be supposed that the general attitude of the British Government towards missions was unfriendly, Mr. Seth Low stated that in spite of the criticisms that had been made of the colonial administration of Great Britain where that administration came into touch with Islam, the American missionary boards had received from all the American missionaries the testimony that throughout British India and everywhere where they came into contact with the British Government, they had no complaint to make.

The evening meetings call for but brief notice. Miss Macdonald, of Tokyo, dealt with the claims of women's work in Japan, and the need of Christian teachers, governmental teaching being purely secular. Miss Kann, a Chinese doctor, said that Chinese wives and daughters were now enjoying a much greater degree of liberty than in the past, a fact which largely increased the opportunities for Christian work among them. At another meeting Mr. W. J. Schiefflin, of New York, gave an interesting account of the great missionary movement inaugurated exclusively by American laymen, which had already changed the entire attitude of the secular press towards missionary work in foreign lands.

The sixth day of the Conference, June 21, was devoted to the consideration of the thorny question of Coöperation and the Promotion of Unity. A resolution, submitted by the Commission, affirming the desirability of a coordination of missionary work, was moved by Sir Andrew Fraser and seconded by Dr. A. J. Brown, of New York. Although it was carried unanimously, as the mere affirmation of a principle, its discussion called forth sundry expressions of opinion wholly at variance with the general sentiment of the Conference. The Bishop of Southwark, for example, said that it would be "ridiculous and impolitic and wrong" if they were to plan one Christian Church in China and leave out the great Roman Catholic community, and Lord William Cecil added that no decided action could be taken until the Greek Church could be included also. One missionary after another, however, testified to what had already been done in various mission fields in the way of coöperation. Mr. Cheng Ching-yi declared that denominationalism had never interested the Chinese mind. Dr. Roberts, of Philadelphia, said the American churches were ready for any organization established to promote Christian unity, but they were not ready to apologize for the Protestant Reformation. And so the discussion went on, until brought to an end by the passage of the resolution. Although not given open expression to, it was clearly the general opinion that the native churches of China, Japan, India, and other countries would make short work of these denominational differences as soon as they were strong enough to stand alone.

The auxiliary meetings of the day and evening were devoted to the consideration of Medical Missions, the situation in the Mohammedan world, and the demands of missionary enterprise upon the Church. Over 170 American Presbyterian delegates were entertained at luncheon by Mr. L. A. Severance, of New York; the Baptist delegates, missionaries and native workers held a reunion of their own, and in the evening one hundred of the most distinguished visitors to the Conference were entertained to dinner by the Senatus of New College, Edinburgh.

IV.

Wednesday, June 22, was devoted to a discussion of the report of Commission V. on "The Preparation of Missionaries."

In presenting the report the Chairman of the Commission, Dr. Douglas Mackenzie, President of Hartford Theological Seminary, U.S.A., said that the success of missions depended to a larger extent on the quality of the missionary than on anything else. He acknowledged that there had been serious defects in the training of missionaries in the past, through lack of appreciation of the fact that work in the mission field called for the exercise not only of all the qualities necessary to a successful ministry at home, but of certain very important additional ones. He had been told that in some part of the world missionaries were neglecting Mohammedans because they could not argue with them. They were not guilty of deliberate neglect of their task; they simply were not prepared for it. They followed the line of least resistance and directed their work where they thought it would be most effective. They should, however, be so trained as to be able to hold their own with the trained representatives of other religions. With regard to educational missionaries, their training had been too exclusively theological. No one should be assigned to educational work without at least one year's instruction in the science of teaching. Language was another weak spot in their equipment. While there were missionaries who were magnificent linguists, they were the exception. It was far better, he said, that they should let a mission suffer for two years than cripple a man of ability for forty.

Mrs. Creighton, a member of the Commission, said that by special missionary preparation they meant the study of the language, religion, history, customs, and social conditions of the field which the missionary was to work, a preparation that was not adequately given anywhere. Often it was not given at all, the chief reason in these cases probably being that the destination of the missionary was not determined long enough in advance. It had been suggested that there should be founded a great world missionary college, but so far as Great Britain was concerned the need would probably be largely met by the School for Oriental Studies which the Government had announced its intention to establish and subsidise. In every country in which missionary enterprise was alive there should be an interdenominational Board of Study to supply what was now so seriously lacking.

President Capen, of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, said that the Commission had been impressed with the unanimity with which their correspondents had demanded that in the future special training be given to every missionary candidate. The missionary work of the present time was being largely carried on in the midst of educational, industrial, social and political movements, which were changing the most venerable institutions of non-Christian lands, and the leaven of Christianity was needed if these changes were to prove a blessing and not a curse.

Bishop Honda, of Tokyo, said that in Japan the missionaries had been received, first for their intellectual attainments and at a later stage for their character and spiritual attainments. He therefore impressed upon the Conference the importance of high spiritual life and personal character, and also of keeping abreast of the intellectual movements of their own countries and of those in which they laboured, a statement that was greeted with hearty applause.

Dr. A. H. Smith, of Peking, said that as a rule missionaries to China spoke the language well, but he recommended the formation of schools of language at Shanghai and other places.

Dr. A. P. Parker, of Shanghai, said there was too much anxiety on the part of the home boards to have the missionaries go promptly to work. The first two years should be devoted without interruption to the study of the language, and it should be done not at home but in the field, in contact with the natives.

The day's proceedings closed with the appointment of a Continuation Committee, to carry out the resolutions of the Conference. Of the 35 members of which it consists, ten represent Great Britain, ten the United States and Canada, and four Germany, France, Norway, Sweden, Holland, Denmark, Finland, Australasia, South Africa, Japan, China and India each have one member. Bishop Honda will represent Japan, Dr. Chatterji, India and Mr. Cheng Ching-yi, China.

With an undiminished attendance and unflagging interest, the Conference addressed itself on the closing day to the consideration of the question of the Home Base of Missions, reported upon by Commission VI. Dr. Donaldson, Master of Magdalen College, Cambridge; Sir Robert Laidlaw; Bishop La Trobe, of Germany; Bishop Hasse, of the Moravian Church, and many others took part in the discussion. The customary votes of thanks were passed with great cordiality.

The final meeting, presided over by Sir Andrew Fraser, and including in its great audience the Earl of Rosebery and Lord Guthrie, in addition to many of the distinguished men who have been more prominently connected with the Conference, was largely of a devotional character, a few impressive words from Dr. John R. Mott, who had with such striking ability presided over the daily sessions, fitly closing the proceedings. With the exception of the unsympathetically received utterances of one or two speakers who deprecated any attempt at unity until the Greek and Roman communions were willing to join—which will surely be in the Greek Kalends—not a jarring note was heard throughout the entire Conference, the predominant features of which—as they appeared to an outsider—were unity of feeling and of purpose, a clear recognition of the present time as the golden moment of opportunity in every great mission field, an equally clear perception of the causes that have militated against success in the past, and a decidedly business-like determination to put the entire work of missions—at least on its intellectual side—on a higher plane.

YOKOHAMA AMATEUR DRAMATIC CLUB.

The annual meeting of the Amateur Dramatic Club was held on the 7th instant, in the Foreign Board of Trade Rooms, when the Report and Accounts were presented and accepted. Interesting speeches were delivered by Mr. E. C. Davis, the President, and by Mr. G. G. Brady. The latter tendered his resignation as a member of the Committee, owing to strictures passed on him by certain members of the community, but the meeting refused to accept it and unanimously re-elected him. The election of officers was then proceeded with.

In presenting the annual report Mr. E. C. Davis pointed with satisfaction to the credit balance of yen 957 shown in the accounts, as well as to the valuable asset of 20 shares in the Public Hall Company. The two plays of the year "The Tyranny of Tears" and "Jedbury Junior" had been very economically produced, especially in the matter of properties, and to this fact the substantial balance in hand was largely due. It was suggested that this sum should be used to form a reserve, to meet the loss usually resulting from musical productions. The next season's productions would include one musical comedy and two other plays, and, if sufficient support was forthcoming, one-act plays with a variety programme might be given.

With regard to Mr. Brady's tendered resignation, the Chairman, after paying a high tribute to that gentleman's histrionic ability and generous assistance in their productions, stated that the cause of his resignation was an ill-conceived and libellous story circulated by some unscrupulous persons to the effect that Mr. Brady's predilection for amateur theatricals was not surprising, seeing that 'he made a good thing out of it in clothes.' Mr. Davis went on to show the falsity of this allegation by declaring that while it was the usual custom in amateur dramatic clubs for the acting members to have their costumes paid for out of the proceeds, Mr. Brady had not, in the course of his ten years' connection with the Club, cost it a single yen in this respect. The Chairman expressed the hope that Mr. Brady would reconsider his decision and continue to place his services at the disposal of the Committee.

The Chairman's remarks were heartily endorsed by Mr. C. F. McWilliams, Mr. F. J. Hall and Mr. E. Beart, whereupon Mr. Brady in a short speech thanked the Chairman for his eulogistic references, and lamented the fact that the Yokohama community possessed a coterie of idle tattlers who lived for gossip's sake and without any regard for the mischief their foolish tales, usually false, might do to inoffensive people. He preferred, however, to remain outside the Committee.

On the motion of Mr. Beart (no one seconding a suggested Committee without Mr. Brady's name on the list), it was proposed and carried that the old Committee be re-elected en bloc, with the addition of Mr. Aslet. The new committee therefore consists of Messrs. E. C. Davis (Chairman), G. G. Brady, W. H. Lewis, F. W. R. Ward, A. H. Windett, A. E. Cooper and C. Aslet.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman brought the proceedings to a close.

THE EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

JUBILEE CONVENTION OF THE BRITISH BRANCH.

The British branch of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States held a business convention on June 15th, terminating in a dinner at the Waldorf Hotel, in commemoration of the Jubilee of the Equitable. The Vice-President, Mr. George T. Wilson, presided, and among those present and speaking in addition to the agency staff were Mr. Paul Morton, the President, formerly Secretary of the Navy, the Earl of Kintore, one of the trustees of the Equitable's deposit in the Bank of England for the benefit of policyholders; Sir William Mather, Mr. John L. Griffiths, Mr. L. H. D. Berridge, M.P.; Mr. William Alexander, Secretary of the Equitable; Governor Edwin Warfield of Maryland; Mr. J. E. Rocquet, Secretary General for Europe of the Equitable; Dr. L. von Farkas of Budapest, and Mr. John T. Hamilton of Tokyo.

Mr. Hamilton proposed the toast of the British branch of the Equitable which was established fifty years ago, shortly after the formation of the Society itself. He alluded to the extensive business, the excellent result, and the good work achieved since its establishment, and noted as one of the salient features of its business the payment to policyholders in Great Britain alone of more than six millions sterling since the opening of the branch office. Mr. Hamilton also referred to the increasing desire of the Japanese people to avail of the protection of life insurance as issued by sound companies offering undoubted security, and of the friendly relations existing between the branch in Japan and its policyholders. He alluded to the certainty that as knowledge of the principles of life insurance and the value of its policies spreads, the business must largely extend, with the greatest advantage and benefit to the progressive people of the Eastern Empire. The same pleasant relations existed between the Society and the Chinese people, who are also firm believers in the utility of life insurance for protective purposes.

Mr. R. T. Naish, the General Manager for Great Britain and Ireland, responded, and an interesting and agreeable entertainment was brought to a close.

THE Nagasaki Press reports that a great deposit of phosphate has recently been discovered in Tajirigun, Loochoo Islands, and application has been made to the authorities for permission to work an area of 350,000 tsubo. In this connection it is stated that large quantities of phosphate are used in Japan as a fertilizer and that the country is practically dependent on imports. The Mitsui Bussan Kaisha alone imports five million yen worth of phosphate.

RAILWAY IMPROVEMENT IN THE NORTH-WESTERN STATES.

THE GREAT NORTHERN'S NEW TRAINS.

The promise made recently by President Louis W. Hill that the Great Northern will furnish Oregon with better transportation facilities, was realized Sunday, June 12, when a new through passenger service was established between St. Paul, Minneapolis and Portland. Trains Nos. 3 and 4, which make their present terminus at Seattle will run solid between St. Paul and Portland via the Spokane, Portland and Seattle road, along the north bank of the Columbia river.

These trains, it is understood, are equipped with compartment observation cars and sleepers, like those in service on the Oriental Limited, the present crack Transcontinental train in operation between Chicago, Seattle and Tacoma. Millions of dollars have been authorized by the Great Northern for the improvement of its passenger equipment. The new cars, as they arrive, will be put on the new Twin City-Portland train, as well as on the other Transcontinental trains in service between Kansas City and Puget Sound country. Train No. 3 will continue to leave St. Paul on its present schedule, arriving at Spokane at 7 p.m. instead of 8.15 p.m., as at present; leaving Spokane at 7.30 p.m. and reaching Portland at 7 a.m. Train No. 4 will leave Portland about 11 a.m., arriving at Spokane at 10.30 p.m., making a daylight run along the Columbia river. There will be no change in the present schedule east of Spokane.

In addition to this service trains Nos. 1 and 2, the "Oriental Limited," will carry through standard and tourist sleeping cars between Chicago and Portland via the Burlington route, Great Northern Railway and S.P. & S. Railway. Connection at Grand Forks with the "Oriental Limited" will still be maintained for Duluth and Superior traffic. Nos. 3 and 4 will also handle through standard and tourist sleeping cars between St. Paul and Tacoma, in addition to their regular Portland equipment.

The U.S. gunboats Wheeling and Petrel, each under the command of Commander Eberly and Lieut.-Commander Taylor, arrived at Yokohama on Tuesday afternoon from San Francisco via Alaska.

The Railway Board, which was once reported to have decided to construct a new Yokohama Station near Tenjin-yama, is now said to have abandoned that scheme and to have proposed instead to enlarge the present Kanagawa Station.

The Railway Board is reported to have decided that the present Yokohama Railway Station will be utilized for electric cars and freights, while a new railway station will be constructed near Tenjin-yama, which is to be connected with Hiranuma Station.

Her Majesty the Empress was pleased on Sunday to visit the new mansion of Marquis Mayeda. Her Majesty stayed there from 11 a.m. till 7 p.m., during which time a band played and the No dance was performed in the Imperial presence.

The fourth year students of the Waseda University have gone on strike in sympathy, it is said, with one of their class-mates who hanged himself on the 5th instant. The deceased is reported to have been expelled from the University on that morning on account of a trifling fault.

A conference of the Privy Council was held on the 7th instant in the presence of His Majesty the Emperor. Marquis Katsura, the Premier, and the other Ministers of State were present. Full explanations were given by the Premier and Count Komura as to the contents of the new Russo-Japanese Convention. It is said that publicity will be given to the Convention on the 13th instant.

A rumour is afloat, says the Asahi, that Mr. Kato Kinzaburo, a prominent rice-merchant, who is said to be closely connected with Baron Goto, Minister of Communications, is jointly concerned with Messrs. Katsura Jiro, Inoue Keijiro, and Nakayama Saichi, in an enterprise for purchasing the Yokohama Gas Works. In the event of their not attaining their object, these persons will establish a new gas works in Yokohama at a cost of from three to five million yen.

The Yokohama Keizai Kyokai is reported to have strongly opposed the Government proposal of enlarging the present Kanagawa Station. According to the Society's opinion, this new proposal is a very important problem to be discussed by Yokohama people, as the enlargement of Kanagawa Station implies the shifting of the centre of the city, so that the Government proposal must be opposed to the utmost. The Society, it is said, has decided to ask the Railway Board to reconsider the matter.

Mr. Kubota, Chief of the Sanitary Bureau in the Home Department, is quoted as saying that the season for the prevalence of epidemic diseases has set in. It is true that hygienic ideas are gradually progressing among individuals, but matters can not be left entirely to the discretion of the people as yet, and there is a necessity for the authorities to enforce strict precautions. Of all the epidemic diseases, none is more tenacious in character than typhoid fever. No marked headway has been made in the investigation of the fever, which is in large part responsible for the difficulty universally experienced in dealing with it. It has recently been discovered that the virus of typhoid fever is disseminated through sputum as well as through the excretions. Persons infected with this virus do not for some time after receiving the infection, differ in appearance from healthy people, which fact renders preventive measures all the more difficult.

The project of the construction of the Tokyo Public Hall, which seems to have arrived at a deadlock, is said to have been progressing in reality. The cost is estimated at 500,000 yen, of which amount 200,000 yen will be borne by the Tokyo-fu and the balance by the Municipality. The site selected for the new building is the Takenodai in Ueno Park, where No. 2 Art Hall has hitherto stood, and the projected hall is to be used for the exhibition of fine art works. The plan being already approved by Governor Abe, the matter will be ultimately decided after the return of Mayor Ozaki from Europe.

His Majesty the Emperor was pleased on the 8th inst. to visit the mansion of Marquis Mayeda, in whose compound two elegant buildings, one in Japanese and the other in foreign style, have recently been built. Several performances of the No dance were given in the Imperial presence. Marquis Tokudaiji, the Grand Chamberlain; Viscount Watanabe, Minister of the Imperial Household; Aide-de-Camp Baron Nakamura and many others attended upon His Majesty.

Her Majesty the Empress is pleased to announce her intention of repairing to the above mansion on the 10th inst.

In connection with the construction of a Public Hall in Tokyo, it is fervently advocated in business circles that as it is an urgent necessity to have the Hall, business-men in the Metropolis will contribute some 100,000 yen towards the cost of constructing the building which is estimated at 500,000 yen, exclusive of the cost of the ground. On the other hand, the City authorities are of opinion that such a hall is not absolutely necessary. Meantime the Tokyo-fu authorities say that it will be the most convenient to reconstruct the building of the City Office, so as to appropriate the first or second floor to the use of the Public Hall.

With regard to the Haneda reclamation question, which has a close connection with the Tokyo-Yokohama Canal construction, the Section of Agriculture and Commerce in the Tokyo-fu persists in the opinion that the reclamation works will obstruct the important industry of laver-collecting in the district and that the people, if deprived of their occupation, will be compelled to starve. In the meantime the Engineering Section has made close investigations as to the advantages and disadvantages of the reclamation works and has applied to the former Section for consultation in this matter, which proposal, however, was declined by the Section of Agriculture and Commerce.

CORRESPONDENCE.

COMPANY DIVIDENDS AND THE "CHUO."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The remarks of the Chuo Shimbun which you reproduce in your issue of this morning, again show the entire want of accuracy so often exhibited by Japanese Newspapers, when commenting on trivial conditions.

The Chuo states that with the exception of the Tokyo Railway Company, and the Tokyo and Osaka Stock Exchanges, the various companies now occupying the principal place in the Japanese economic world, have been barely able to do more than pay dividends, which have been drawn from the reserves.

I would point out that the majority of the Companies cited have not yet published their half yearly accounts, and therefore the dividends stated to have been paid, will not, in fact, be paid for some time yet.

Whether these dividends are taken from Reserves therefore, is a matter that the Chuo cannot possibly have any knowledge of unless it has private sources of information denied to the rest of the public.

As a matter of fact, information about Japanese Company dividends, has a queer way of leaking out some time before the published report appears, and the dividend figures quoted by the Chuo, coincide with what are now generally understood to be the rates that will be paid for the half year.

Seeing that these dividends are in nearly all cases equal to the preceding half year—that dividends ranging from 6 to 20 per cent. can hardly be considered indicative of bad trade, and also that there are no signs whatever of any diminution in the activity of the various undertakings alluded to, it would almost appear as though the Chuo were merely reproducing the irresponsible and perverted statements which are so freely circulated by stock exchange speculators for their own purposes. Whether these accounts when published will verify the Chuo's statement that the reserves have furnished the dividends, is a matter that the readers of that journal will shortly have opportunity of judging.

I am Sir, Yours, etc.

MERCHANT.

MR. MATSUMURA KAI-EKI.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In the Japan Weekly Mail of June 25th, under the "Monthly Summary of the Japanese Religious Press," there appeared the report of an interview between Dr. King, President of Oberlin College, and Mr. Matsumura Kaiseki, a well-known writer of Christian books.

In this interview Mr. Matsumura shows that he still holds to the same old narrow, egotistic views that have gipped him for thirty years. He is like a turtle that can poke his head out of his shell and see the world move and progress, but the best he can do is to drag his shell with him when he tries to move with the world. It's a great handicap. He speaks of missionaries as tsumaranu senkyoshi, which your translator renders into English as "inferior missionaries." But the common use of tsumaranu is where we use such terms as "worthless," "of no account," "foolish," "absurd," etc. So Mr. Matsumura has been longing for the past thirty years to get rid of these worthless missionaries and instead get their worthy money. He says we would see a wonderful activity in the evangelistic world if this could be done. What a wonderful thought! It must have cost Mr. Matsumura much labour and pain to give birth to such an idea. Wonder why somebody else hadn't thought of this before now. Surely there would be activity, for "money makes the mare go" in Japan as well as in the West. And to receive by mail monthly large bank drafts from churches in other countries to which he would have no administrative or ecclesiastical responsibility would be a happier event than finding a land that flowed with milk and honey, looked at from his point of view.

But if Mr. Matsumura should live three more decades he will not find a Board of Missions so silly as to fall in with his pet scheme. He will have to get up something that is not quite so foxy. The managers of Mission Boards know that such large sums of foreign money put into the hands of a young self-governing church would stunt its spirit of self-reliance, paralyze its own ideas of sacrificing and giving, and thus indefinitely delay the day of its real independence. And then, too, the missionary spirit of the West, the Christian bushido, has nothing in common with a shriveled and selfish soul. All they give in men and money is a free-will offering, expecting nothing in return. And the man who is so full of prejudice that he cannot work with the missionaries, but asks for their recall with the hope and purpose of getting their money, deserves only pity for his littleness. The man who openly rejects the missionary, his teaching, and his money is highly respected in comparison. I feel quite sure that the great body of Japanese Christians heartily detest such a sordid and selfish spirit. During the past three years nearly all the Japanese Churches have been asking for more missionaries to be sent to Japan, and there hasn't been a time during the past two decades when the work and help of the missionary was so heartily welcomed as at the present time by the Japanese pastors and church-members. And to this call for more missionaries the home churches are responding as best they can. So I see nothing else for Mr. Matsumura to do but to go on crawling about in his shell and grumbling because he can't get rid of the missionaries and can't get their money to spend as he would like. Really his views would make one laugh if it were not for the fact that many people will read his statements and think they represent Christianity in Japan, which would grieve those who know better and are working faithfully to Christianize this country.

Yours truly,

WILL PATTILLO.

EXPRESS TRAINS STOPPING AT GOTEMBA.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In the summer season the Railway Bureau makes various changes for the accommodation of travellers; and one other change that would be much appreciated would be to let more, or all, of the express trains stop at Gotemba between, say, July 20 and Sept. 10 when so many are going to and from Mount Fuji. The express trains almost come to a stop at the station where the extra engine is taken off, and it seems that the two or three minutes lost could be made up in some way.

Yours etc.,

M.

The Prince eulogised the work of Baron Oura and welcomed the entry of Japan into friendly commercial rivalry, but he hoped the Japanese workman would never lose the delicate handicraft characteristic of his race.

Baron Oura said, in reply, that he was happy to state that the people of Japan through the Exhibition were coming into closer contact with England. The Exhibition was a complete demonstration to the world that Great Britain and Japan were united in maintaining the dignity of commerce and the peace of the world.

The Duke of Montrose said the Russo-Japanese Convention had forged one more chain in the peace of the world.

THE CIVIL LIST.

PROVISION FOR ROYALTIES.

In a report presented to the House of Commons the Committee on the Civil List states that it sees no reason for altering the provision made in 1901, which it is satisfied is adequate, but no more than adequate, to maintain the dignity of the Crown. Queen Alexandra is entitled to an annuity of £70,000. A similar amount should be assigned to Queen Mary in the event of widowhood. In the event of the Prince of Wales marrying, his wife would be allowed £10,000 yearly. The annuity to each of the King's sons would be increased to £25,000 on marriage, while the daughters would receive £6,000. The total is £634,000 compared with £621,000 in the late reign.

The Berlin papers give prominence to the PATRIOTIC ACTION OF LIVERPOOL CITIZENS.

London, July 9.

Replying to a deputation of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom with reference to the dock accommodation on the East Coast, Mr. McKenna, First Lord of the Admiralty, said two floating docks were being constructed to take in the largest ships, and a drydock at Rosyth would be completed in four and a half years. The Humber was unsuitable as a naval base. Liverpool had decided to build, unassisted by the Government, a dock a thousand feet long and 120 feet wide, which would be available for naval purposes.

The nation, added Mr. McKenna, should be grateful to Liverpool for its patriotism and enterprise.

The Frankfurter Zeitung says that the Agreement has not changed the situation between Russia and Japan, who will remain natural enemies.

The Vossische Zeitung says that the Agreement is directed against America, Japan's most dangerous competitor.

FRANCHISE FOR WOMEN.

Mr. Shackleton, a Labour member, has moved the second reading of a bill extending the municipal franchise, now possessed by women, to parliamentary elections.

The leaders of both sides of the House are leaving their followers complete freedom in the matter.

Mr. F. E. Smith (Cons.), in moving the rejection of the Bill, made a powerful speech. The precedents of Norway, Australia, and New Zealand were, he said, worthless for an empire of 460 million people, of whom 300 millions are Orientals, who detest government by women.

THE KAISER AND NICARAGUA.

COMMENT AT WASHINGTON.

London, July 12.

The publication of a letter of the Kaiser, recognising General Madriz as President of Nicaragua, is commented upon in Washington, as Madriz is not recognised by the United States or Great Britain. The State Department, however, does not treat the letter seriously and regards it as a blunder of the German Foreign Office.

There have been rumours in Washington that Madriz offered a coaling station to a certain European Power recognising him.

EULOGY OF JAPAN.

Ambassador Kato was the guest of honour at a dinner given by the Lyceum Club.

THE GERMAN PRESS AND THE NEW CONVENTION.

The Koelnische Zeitung says that the new Russo-Japanese Agreement arose from Russia's need to carry out her Asiatic policy undisturbed, and Japan's wish to develop peacefully her conquests acquired by war. The Agreement will therefore be welcomed in Germany, as elsewhere, as a guarantee of peace. Judgment must, however, be withheld at present with regard to its economic aspect.

Later.

The Kaiser's letter about Nicaragua has created a sensation in Berlin, where messages describing its publication in America have been re translated from London.

A THREATENED BOYCOTT.

The Immigrants' Office at San Francisco having been moved to Enzer Island, its remoteness from the Chinese Immigrants' Detention Station is causing great inconvenience. The Chinese therefore sought permission to move the Station to the Island, but the authorities refused. Accordingly the six principal Chinese merchants and the Chamber of Commerce formed a "League of Justice" and announced a boycott of the Americans. The latter remonstrated, pointing out the disadvantage to the Chinese themselves, and the Chinese replied that they acted not from choice but as a last resource for gaining currency for their views. They agreed to suspend the boycott and observe events, but their spirit in high.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE CONVENTION.

GERMAN OPINION.

Berlin.—The German verdict on the Russo-Japanese Agreement is adverse, assuming that it is directed against the interests of the United States. The Kreuz Zeitung has conceived the idea of an Austro-German-American Alliance necessary as a corrective of the new four-Powers entente, saying that the iron ought to be struck while it is hot. The Vossische Zeitung remarks that Japan has scored a diplomatic success, while Russia has been brought to a halt in Manchuria. Japan will make the Agreement a fresh point of departure.

FRENCH COMMENT.

Paris.—The French Press welcomes the Agreement. The Journal de Debats says that the entente deals a blow at the pan-German idea of a European coalition against the yellow races.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

The enterprising Hakubunkan has just issued, as an Extra Number of the Taiyō, a bulky volume entitled The Japan-British Exhibition, compiled by Mr. Asada Kōson. The Number is well illustrated and the articles on English life, English commerce, amusements, tastes, proclivities, religion and other subjects have been written by well known men. Among the weightier articles we find one by Dr. J. Soeda entitled:—England's Position in the Economic World. Dr. Soeda first dwells on England's rank as a commercial and industrial Power and mentions the fact that more than half of the world's shipping belongs to her. Though he thinks that it will be no easy matter for either America or Germany to surpass her in the whole of the business world, he says that in certain countries Englishmen show less zeal than Germans and Americans in finding new markets for the goods they have to sell. Dr. Soeda is of opinion that love of ease and indulgence in luxury are growing apace in England. This, if not checked, means eventual defeat in the race for pre-eminence among the nations. Dr. Soeda holds that England's greatness in the financial world up to to-day has been solely, or principally, owing to her steady adherence to the principle of free trade, and that the adoption of a protective policy would certainly remove her from the position of pre-eminence she now occupies (Moshi Eikoku ga kono shugi wo hai suru naraba, sono zento wa ankoku to nari, keizaiikai ni oyobosu eikyō wa hakari shirezaru mono ga arō to omou).

An anonymous writer in the Japan-British Exhibition compares the character of English business men with that of the German and that of the American. "Slow but sure," he thinks to be the Englishman's motto. He points out, however, that in recent years English commercial ideas have been greatly influenced by both German and American methods of doing business.

Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō, under the title "A few Englishmen that still remain in my memory" publishes reminiscences of the late Dr. Summers, Dr. Syle, Professor Cooper and Lafcadio Hearn.

The views of Frenchmen and Germans on England are given in separate articles translated from the French and German press. There is also an article on English ladies as they appear to a Japanese lady. Altogether the volume should prove to be of considerable interest to Japanese readers.

The Chūō Kōron publishes a series of articles entitled Rich Men Connected with Politics to-day. From these we make a few quotations. Dr. Miyake Setsurei says that the general rule with the heads of big business houses in Japan is to keep aloof from politics as far as any direct action is concerned, but that as a result of personal friendship with prominent statesmen some of Japan's capitalists have joined hands with politicians in certain financial transactions. Marquis Inoue's relationship to the Mitsui family has always meant that the heads of the house could be approached and their assistance asked for the carrying out of certain schemes. The Iwasaki house, as a house, has carefully kept aloof from politics, but in a small way, by supporting men like Mr. Ōishi Masami and Mr. Inukai, the Iwasakis have exercised some little influence on politics. The head of the Furukawa house, while having no direct connection with politics, has indirectly affected them considerably. The late Count Mutsu, Prince Itō and Marquis Inoue have all been on close terms of friendship with the Furukawa family, and two prominent men in the Seiyūkai, Messrs. Hara and Okazaki, have benefited much from the patronage of this rich house. As to the head of the Sumitomo house, he is closely related to Marquis Saionji, so, though he avoids all open interference with politics, he is unavoidably dragged into them on certain occasions.

The next writer on this subject, Mr. Matsui Hakken, states that it is well known to politicians that the Mitsu Bishi Company and the Nippon Yusen Kaisha annually supply the President of a certain political party with sufficient money to live on. This writer also asserts that members of the Diet and journalists receive money from various banks and companies, and that the Mitsui Brothers habitually disburse fixed sums of money among members of the Diet and journalists (Mitsui-ke ga aru giin, aru shimbun kisha ni nennen itteikaku wo soyo shi, &c.). There are journalists who receive more from the Mitsui Company every month than they are paid by the newspaper offices to which they belong.

Among the remarks of Mr. D. Tagawa we find the following:—In my belief the capitalists who are most closely connected with the Government are the Mitsui Brothers and Ōkura Kihachirō. But this connection has been created by the businesses in which these men are engaged. This necessitates their being on intimate terms with officialdom. But their relationship to the Government is not productive of harm. It matters little to them what men are in power. Each Government needs the assistance they are prepared to give and each Government has to provide a quid pro quo as far as they are concerned. In this country it is true to say that no rich man or rich men have it in their power to control Cabinets or to dictate to them. This is largely due to the fact that as a result of centuries of anti-sordid sentiment there is no worship of moneyed men to-day. Unless they have other claims to respect such men are invariably despised. That individual politicians like Messrs. Ōishi, Inukai and Hara should receive pecuniary help from capitalists is not a matter of any importance.

"A Certain Doctor" says that among rich business men who take a keen interest in politics, Mr. Toyokawa Ryohei occupies a prominent position. He goes on to assert that Mr. Toyokawa was the chief wire-puller in the formation of the Kokkumintō, notwithstanding the fact that the organisation of this party was attributed to Messrs. Kataoka, Sengoku and other members of what is known as the Tosa faction of politicians. As regards the connection of capitalists with statesmen, "A Certain Doctor" makes the following observations.—The connection of the Mitsui brothers with Marquis Inoue and with a certain section of the Seiyūkai is well known. That Mr. Furukawa supplies Mr. Hara Kei with money to cover certain expenses connected with the Seiyūkai's operations is unquestionable. What Mr. Hara would be minus Mr. Furukawa is a difficult question to answer. Mr. Matsuyama Chūjirō says that Mr. Toyokawa's position as regards the Iwasaki family resembles that of Ōkubo Hikozōemon in the family of the first Tokugawa Shōguns, and he thinks that there is no business man in Japan who exercises so much political influence as Mr. Toyokawa. He relates a conversation held with this gentleman, however, which tends to show that the extent to which Mr. Toyokawa mixes himself up with political affairs has been greatly exaggerated. Mr. Toyokawa is reported as saying that he is not cut out for figuring as a politician and also that he has now reached an age when men do not strike out in new lines of enterprise. He represents himself as a business man and nothing more.

As will be seen by the above quotations, opinion is much divided as to the extent to which capitalists meddle with politics. Some of the writers assert unhesitatingly that there is no connection at all between great capitalists and statesmen in this country. An anonymous writer says this:—Genkon no fugō ni shite, seiji ni kwankei aru mono jissai aru de arō ka? Wagahai wa ichinin mo nashi to dengen suru wo habakaranu. (Is it a fact that there are any capitalists to-day who have relations with the Government? I have no hesitation in saying that there is not one such to be found). The opinion of Count Ōkuma and Mr. Ozaki Yukio is that politics in this country are not likely to be seriously affected by the misuse of money on the part of great capitalists. The question undoubtedly has many sides to it, and it is not easy to reach any generalization which covers all the facts bearing on the case.

The July Taiyō contains several articles on the annexation of Korea and the policy to be adopted in governing the peninsula after annexation. Count Hayashi and others seem to regard annexation as sure to take place. Discussing the policy to be adopted by the Japanese Government, in substance, the Count expresses himself as follows:—Into details connected with the carrying out of the policy our Government adopts I do not intend to enter. But as regards the main course to be followed it is desirable that we should clear our minds of misapprehensions. Korea must either be governed absolutely as India is governed by England, or she must be allowed to govern herself as Canada, Australia and South Africa govern themselves under the English flag. Whether self-government succeeds or not depends entirely on the extent to which a country is enlightened and educated. No Japanese whose opinion is worth taking maintains that Korea is sufficiently advanced to be granted a constitution and allowed to administer her own affairs uncontrolled by us. It is quite plain that the country must be governed absolutely for some time to come. But this does not mean that no local autonomy will be granted to towns, villages and rural districts. Coming to the question of the treatment the present King of Korea is to receive, this is a detail that may well be left to our Government to determine. Under English rule there are numerous Indian potentates whose liberty of action is by no means the same. England deals with each ruler according to local circumstances and the political situation in his dominion. Some of the rajahs hardly have any liberty at all; others wield considerable power.

Japan can learn much from England as to how to treat the Korean royal family.

Having decided on the main policy to be followed all that we need in Korea is good government. It goes without saying that no government can be good that fails to promote the welfare of the people and to maintain order. There are people who say that the Koreans are not amenable to law and that it is useless to expect to control them by law alone. Though there is some truth in this, yet they have to be educated to obey the laws of the land.

To Mr. Takekoshi Yosaburō annexation appears to be inadvisable. Financially, he says, it is likely to prove to be a serious drain on Japan's limited resources. Already Japan's yearly expenditure in Korea has grown to be very heavy. Out of a total expenditure of about forty-two or forty-three million yen Japan provides thirty-two million yen. Besides this she has granted Korea a loan of 5 million yen free of interest, which is practically a gift, as there is no expectation of its ever being returned. No European country has ever advanced to a colony sums of money so out of all reasonable proportion to the commercial and industrial yield of this colony. While disapproving of annexation, Mr. Takekoshi advocates the removal of the intriguing members of the Royal family to Tōkyō, where they can be watched. Mr. Takekoshi is of opinion that radical changes in the system of local government and in other things would be a mistake. How far the Koreans will assimilate themselves to the Japanese it is impossible to determine. The system of local administration in operation in the Peninsula has its roots in the past history of the people, and in many particulars it suits the Korean mind. The French tried radical reforms in Annam of the kind Japan proposes to enforce in Korea, but eventually gave up the task of attempting to convert Annamese into Frenchmen and to govern them without using their own King as a medium. At present all orders are issued in the name of the King and even the year period dates from his accession to the throne three years ago. The new policy adopted by France in her government of Annam has had a most beneficial effect, so that whereas formerly when France resorted to the tactics on which our Government relies in Korea there were constant disturbances, now, order is maintained throughout the country with the greatest ease. Our present policy in Korea is a mistaken one, says Mr. Takekoshi. What have we to show for all our display of military strength and official authority and for the annual outlay of 32 million yen? Is the game worth the candle? The present Resident-General is not the right man for the post he fills.

Mr. Hasegawa Hōnosuke, in a very well written article, affirms that there is no greater problem awaiting solution at Japan's hands than the question of how the Koreans should be governed. Korea to-day is in a transitional period, says this writer, the old civilisation has partly passed away, and no adequate new civilisation has been created to take its place. Korea is several centuries behind Japan. She may be said to be passing through our Kamakura age or our Muromachi age. Whereas this is so, our Resident General up to the present time has been trying to apply our modern laws and rules to people in an entirely different stage of thought. Our Japanese laws were framed for our special use and to meet the needs of modern Japan, but any attempt to make use of them in another country, and among people quite differently circumstanced from ourselves, is bound to lead to mischief. Our present laws came into existence owing to the necessity of our qualifying ourselves to stand on an equality with Western nations and to assume control over the Europeans and Americans settled in this country. They may be said to be somewhat in advance of the state of society in this country to-day. It is very plain then that these laws must prove in many respects still more unsuitable to people like the Koreans who are still centuries behind us. The Koreans have not reached the stage for being controlled by civilised laws of the modern type.

Hence it is my opinion that they should be governed by the application of common-sense rather than by the administration of fixed written laws. Up to the year 1877, Korea had a very simple system of local government, according to which the governors of different provinces administered justice, superintended the collection of taxes, forestry, mining and several other things. And these governors were very highly respected, and their administration was in many respects far superior to ours in this country at the opening of the Meiji era, and yielded better results than our newly established government in the Peninsula. The fact is we are framing too many laws and too many rules for a simple-minded people like the Koreans. If we annex Korea, the most urgent of our duties will be to find a remedy for this weakness in our administration of affairs there.

Mr. Hasegawa next goes on to discuss the qualifications necessary for the Japanese officials to be employed in Korea. He thinks that what is known in this country as the "high-collar" set of officials are quite unsuited to the present condition of the Koreans. Administrators of law whose heads are full of foreign rules for the application of written laws, and who are solely guided by the Western theories which they have adopted and which they think capable of being put into practice, irrespective of the circumstances and state of the persons with whom these jurists are dealing, certainly should not be entrusted with authority in Korea, says Mr. Hasegawa. The fact is that what we need in Korea are officials who are not bound by the hard and fast laws of administration in force in this country, but who are free to relax those laws whenever occasion calls for it. Koreans can not be governed in the precise way our own people are governed. It is most desirable that the number of Japanese officials employed in Korea should be greatly reduced at no distant date, and that the administration of the government should be entrusted to Koreans. It is only necessary that the heads of the various departments should be Japanese. Officials, who are entirely dependent on interpreters in their dealings with the Koreans are not likely to make successful administrators. It seems to me that in governing the Koreans the one thing we must avoid is resort to despotic methods of any kind. There are people in this country who advocate persecution or suppression of Christianity because some Christians have made disloyal speeches or committed disloyal acts. But this would be a silly policy to adopt. Religious liberty must be granted to the Koreans, and as for foreign missionaries, they can be trusted to act judiciously and keep free from politics in the propagation of the Christian faith. Japanese Christian pastors will certainly help forward the work of Japonicizing the Koreans, granting that this is capable of being accomplished. But will the Koreans ever assimilate themselves to the Japanese? It can only be effected by means of education. Annexation not followed by assimilation would prove anything but a blessing to this country.

Another long article appears over a pseudonym assumed by a resident in Seoul in which the writer takes a grave view of the present situation. The economic future of the Peninsula he regards with great anxiety, and the prevalence of militarism among present administrators of government in the peninsula, according to this writer, portends nothing but evil in the future. The present system is calculated to rob the Koreans of independence altogether. Since communications, the military, the law courts and all other centres of authority have been handed over to the Japanese, the Peninsula is in point of fact no longer independent (Kōsū, heiba, shihō, sono ta no shoken wo Nihon ni yudane-saritaru Hanshima wa sude ni sude ni dokuritsu no jitsu wo ushinaeru mono nari). To appeal to the sword on every occasion is the wrong way to govern. If Korea is to be governed successfully, actions that arouse indignation must be avoided, and a thoroughly conciliatory policy must be adopted.

We extract the following from Dr. Miyake

Setsurei's article on current Japanese literature published in the July Taiyō:—Our novels to-day are all pitched in one key. Those who like the key are no doubt satisfied, but there is a large number of readers whose tastes are not gratified by the mental food supplied by our modern novelists. In Western countries fiction covers such a wide area and there are so many really great works to choose from that novel-readers are not dependent on the productions of living writers to any extent. But with us the case is quite different. As far as fiction is concerned we have broken with the past. In the England of a century ago, as it is portrayed in standard novels, Englishmen still take a keen interest. But to-day few people can be induced to read Japanese novels which appeared in the Tokugawa age. The attempt to revive interest in Bakin's novels and Chikamatsu's dramas by bringing out new, cheap editions of them has failed. The style in which these works are composed is regarded as painfully tedious and prosy by modern readers. Whereas English readers still find delight in Shakespeare, Milton and Scott, there is now next to no general interest taken in the works of fiction published in this country a century or two centuries ago. Though some of these books are being sold at ridiculously low prices, the demand for them is confined to a very small section of readers.

The novels that are most read to-day are of three kinds only. They are either, (1) the self-revelations penned by the Naturalistic School of novelists, or (2) Natsume Sōseki's stories, in which the hero is in character and spirit a true Edoite (Edokko), or (3) they are tales written by Tokutomi Roka (the brother of the editor of the Kokumin Shinbun) on some striking incident connected with modern society.

As for Mori Ōgai, his psychological make-up has in it two incompatible elements. His military life has imbued him with a respect for authority and a readiness to obey commands. But his recent works show an admiration for looseness of morals and general Bohemianism. Now it is impossible to reconcile these two marked tendencies. And their conflict, it seems to me, seriously interferes with Ōgai's literary success. In the early part of his career, he made a name for himself by reproducing in Japanese certain German works. In recent years what he has penned may have served to while away weary hours, but regarded as serious literary productions they are of little value. If he has any ambition to figure as a first-class fiction writer, he would have done well to refrain from publishing such stories as have been recently written by him. He should have followed Koda Rohan's example and have kept quiet.

There is considerable charm about the novels of Natsume Sōseki, so much so, that one can peruse them repeatedly without satiety. It is uncertain whether Sōseki will join the Naturalistic School of novelists eventually or not. His present attitude to that School is unpronounced. It is undoubtedly a fact that the most prosperous period of our modern fiction was during the years when Kōyō and Rohan were giving their best works to our reading world. These books were greatly superior to the productions of the Naturalists of to-day. And even now they probably command a larger number of readers than more recent tales. The extent to which the novels produced by the Naturalistic School are read is limited to a small section of the community. The reason of their general unpopularity lies in the fact that the heroes of their stories are not the kind of men and women met with in everyday life, but eccentricities and oddities. Moreover, these heroes are invariably lacking in will. People weary of reading about specimens of human nature that are so contorted as to resemble monsters, hobgoblins, or lunatics, as the case may be. How long this tendency in our literary world may last it is hard to predict. It may be that we shall go back to romanticism or to the classic type of novel. What is required to bring about a thorough change is the production of some successful work of an entirely different character from the novels now appearing. What is capable of being accomplished in this line by the production of a masterpiece is well illustrated by the manner in which the well-known work of Mr. Shiba Shiro, called Kajin no Kigū, effected just at the time when the movement in favour of adopting Roman letters or kana for writing our language had reached its height. This novel of Shiba's was written in classical Chinese, and it had the effect of convincing the public that this style was infinitely superior to the semi-colloquial style resorted to by the Romajikai and Kana-no-kai writers of that time, and that the retention of the ideographs was necessary for the production of such fine works as the one above named. Shiba's story helped to kill the movement in favour of the abolition of Chinese characters. It seems to me that any amount of condemnation of the present style of novel writing will not alter the situation. What is wanted is the production of a work which shall be infinitely superior in subject and execution to anything offered to the reading public by the Naturalists.

Dr. J. Soeda, writing in the Jitsugyō no Sekai, on the needs of the Japanese business world, says that the ideas of his fellow-countrymen need revolutionizing. He complains of the general lethargy and indifference to their true interests displayed by many Japanese traders, and asserts that thoroughly trustworthy and earnest-minded men are very scarce. Comparing the average Japanese with the average foreigner, Dr. Soeda remarks that foreigners are somewhat blunt and outspoken, that they appear just as they are, but that Japanese assume a character that is not theirs, labouring to give an air of greatness or superiority to their actions, and boasting that they are above taking notice of trifles. (Gwaikei wo shu to shi, itazurani ko-eiyū [ancient heroes] no gwaiyō wo mogi shi, saiji ni kakawaranu wo motte hokori to sūru fū ga aru). In a warlike age, in a society of warriors, what are known as gōketsufū or heroic airs no doubt answered very well, but in our modern business world they make a man look ridiculous and create a bad impression among his fellows. A man should not try to make himself appear other than he is. . . . We Japanese do not fully realize how much we have to exert ourselves in order to compete successfully with foreign countries. "The Japanese are only formidable on the battlefield; elsewhere they are of no account whatever" is a comment that is often made on us by foreigners. It is for us to show that if true in the past this shall no longer be true. For our competition with Western nations we need new knowledge, more resolution, more zeal, strict integrity and the spirit of co-operation. The future of Japan depends largely on the achievements of our business men. As a body they are still suffering from the effects of feudal influences, says Dr. Soeda.

As has already been stated in these columns, Mr. Shōda Heigorō, so long associated with the Mitsu Bishi Company, has retired into private life. "How shall I spend my old age?" is the title of an article, or rather of a reported talk, of his which appears in the Jitsugyō no Nihon. Mr. Shōda's reason for retiring from active participation in business was not ill-health nor decrepitude, but a feeling that he was no longer able to keep pace with men of 40 or 50 years of age, that is, he was actuated by the laudable desire to make room for more active men. Having withdrawn from the management of the business of the Mitsu Bishi Company, he says he is at a loss to know how to occupy himself. Business has been his one pleasure. Tastes, he tells us, he has none. Neither in floriculture nor in tea-drinking does he take delight. His mind, like that of many a good business man, being cast in a serious mould, even in extreme old age those trifling pastimes by resort to which some men manage to while away tedious hours have no attractions for him. Having always taken a keen interest in industry, one thing he proposes doing is to visit the different Japanese centres of industry and to take note of the methods of manufacture followed in each place. He has very decided views on the management of factory hands. The law which it is proposed to pass dealing with this subject is, he says, a mere réchauffé of a Western dish and is not at all suited to Japanese palates. There is no need here for legislation of the kind proposed, says Mr. Shōda. It is pretended that the reforms advocated are demanded by the laws of humanity. This plea is brought forward in imitation of the tactics resorted to in Western countries where the conditions are entirely different from what they are here. The measures proposed, concludes Mr. Shōda, are calculated to do considerable harm, to destroy those good habits which our workmen have had transmitted to them by their forefathers. Much that is done in the name of charity and humanity is attended by greater evils than those which it is sought to remedy. Mr. Shōda speaks disapprovingly of the practice of handing over large sums of money to charitable institutions years before their decease followed by certain Western capitalists. He thinks it to be more patriotic to leave such money in concerns which are yielding profit to the State, and are yearly adding to the financial strength of the country.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A NAGOYA despatch says that it was decided at a meeting of blind persons held on Saturday to establish a library for the blind. The cost, which is estimated at 5,580 yen, will be collected by subscriptions.

THE bye-electoral campaign in Kobe has resulted in a victory for the Kokumin to. Mr. Nozoye Soyo of that party was returned with a majority of 2,660 votes, while Mr. Matsukata Kojiro of the Seiyu kai polled 2,355 votes.

PRINCE HENRY, the King's third son, will enter the school at St. Peter's Court, Broadstairs, as a boarder, and discontinue the arrangement by which for some time past he has been attending as a day boy. Sir Francis Laking reports a steady improvement in Prince Henry's health.

THE Hamburg-America steamer Hoangho has been purchased at Hongkong by Messrs. G. Urrutia & Co., of Manila, to replace the Nuestra Señora del Pilar which sank some time ago in a collision with the schooner Mangayan. The vessel was expected to leave Hongkong about July 12. This steamer will cost the Company about P.80,000.

RESIDENT-GENERAL VISCOUNT TERAUCHI is to leave Tokyo on the 15th instant. Breaking his journey at Kyoto and Yamaguchi the Viscount will board the warship Yakumo at Bakan and is expected to arrive at Seoul on the 23rd instant. Councillor Komatsu and Secretary Kodama, who are now in Tokyo, will accompany the Resident-General.

A KOFU despatch says that a man named Hanada, who had been arrested on suspicion of theft, has been tortured to death by the police at Yamura, near Kofu. The police authorities claim that the poor man hanged himself, but on his body there are marks of torture by whips and red-hot irons. The Kofu and Tokyo Barristers' Associations are bringing action against the Yamura Police.

PHILATELISTS will be interested to learn that a newspaper in Holland has received advices from London that the new issue of British stamps now used will be issued until the stock is exhausted, but they will be the last of the kind. The new stamps will, so it is reported, be modelled after the Austro-Hungarian Jubilee issue, and will depict scenes from British history, to show at a glance the development of the kingdom and its glorious past. In this connection it is interesting to learn, on the authority of the China Mail, that King George's head already appears on a postage stamp. It is the five cent. Newfoundland, and was issued in 1896. Newfoundland is our oldest colony, and possesses four other royal portrait stamps, namely, Prince Edward, now Heir-Apparent, half cent., Queen Victoria, one cent.; King Edward, two cent.; and Queen Alexandra, three cents.

GENERAL BOTHA, replying to an address of welcome from the Pietermaritzburg municipality reiterated his intention of making the Union a success and of proving to the British people that the Dutch were worthy of the great trust reposed in them. Any Government, General Botha continued, which adopted any other policy would be short-lived. The British flag was the best thing for the Union, and ensured the protection of the young nation. He promised to do his utmost to kill racialism throughout the Union, and urged the use of common sense, which would enable the races to live peacefully together.

THE directors of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha have appointed Mr. R. Negishi, acting manager of the London branch office, in place of the late manager, Mr. T. H. James, says the N.-C. Daily News. Mr. James Blair has been appointed assistant manager. Mr. Negishi's association with shipping has been a lengthy one. About thirty years ago he entered the service of the Mitsui Bishi Steamship Company. Mr. Negishi has travelled considerably through Eastern cities. Stationed for a time at Kobe, he was afterwards transferred to Otaru, where he spent about four years. He was then called back to the Company's headquarters at Tokyo, where he rendered nine years' useful service as assistant manager. His next appointment was in London, where he arrived in 1896—just about the time the Company was starting its European line. Since then Mr. Negishi has held the position of assistant London manager, and in that capacity has gained many friends.

Two lady visitors from London recently had an unusual experience in the Snowdon range of North Wales. They drove from Beddgelert to Capel Curig and thence walked to Ogwen Lake, where, diverging from the highway, they took the rocky road to Idwal Lake. There they decided to climb Carnedd Llewelyn, one of the highest peaks in the district, with the object of getting into Trefriw, an inland resort in the Conway Valley. Carnedd Llewelyn was climbed with little or no difficulty, but they experienced great hardships in making the descent on the opposite side. A high wind was blowing, and Miss Buckea was thrown down many times. Both were obliged on several occasions to crouch and slide, so steep were the slopes. Night came and they lost their way, but, nothing daunted, they gradually made the descent, and having spent the whole night on the mountain reached Bethesda at 5.30 next morning in a very weak condition. From there they walked to Bangor, where they entrained for Trefriw, having been for twenty-four hours on their feet continuously and without food.

THE OPEN GOLF CHAMPIONSHIP.

BRAID WINS FOR THE FIFTH TIME AFTER EXCITING FINISH.

St. Andrews, June 24.

It is James Braid's fifth Open Championship: he won in grand style this afternoon. Mr. Horace Hutchinson's "Triumvirate" had each won four Open Championships, but Taylor and Vardon are now left behind. In the course of nine summers Braid has won five times.

The scene on the home green this afternoon as thousands of people surged to the verge of the putting ground was very impressive, writes the special correspondent of a London journal. The driver and the brassie had taken Braid on to the green, and left him with seven strokes in hand. He was short with his approach putt of ten yards; he took two more, and then the championship was his. For the moment the crowd evidently did not know he was so much in hand, but the news spread quickly, and Braid had to submit to the ordeal of being carried on the shoulders of his admirers. He is a big man, and his passage was awkward. There were no stalwart fishermen in waiting to do the business thoroughly as it was performed for Mr. John Ball three weeks ago on Hoylake Links.

This victory of Braid's was not gained until we had passed through a morning of intense excitement. The restless record-making which began on Wednesday was given a fresh impetus in the forenoon, when George Duncan tied Willie Smith's figures of yesterday (71) and got two strokes better than Braid; but early after lunch Duncan went to pieces, the old war horse of Walton Heath "rolling out his fours" pretty regularly, and it was soon known that he virtually had the championship in hand.

Naturally the position of the leaders last night promised a thrilling third day's golf. Four strokes covered the differences among the first seven men, and there were three others only one stroke worse. The fight developed early. George Duncan and James Braid were among the first eight couples, and Willie Smith was off before ten o'clock. It was among these three men that we all looked for the winner. Everyone had a lurking regard for the chances of Braid, who naturally commanded the biggest following. The interest was intense. News travels quickly on a golf links. At every hole there was an accumulation of knowledge of the fortunes of the men, and while Braid and Duncan were keeping "within fours" the interest for Willie Smith suddenly evaporated. The burly Carnoustie and Mexican golfer was correct enough for four holes, but the fifth hole was fatal to his figures. A sliced tee shot put him in one of the new bunkers guarding the fairway well up on the right. He took three to get out, and six to reach the green. With two putts he was eight for the hole.

It was the old story of sorrows coming "not in single spies, but in battalions." A bunker tee shot to the sixth (this time two to play out) completed Smith's discomfiture; and so, with an eighty, the man responsible for all the sensation in yesterday's sunset was virtually put out of action. Those who had not seen Willie Smith when he was doing his record felt it something of a duty to be with him for a few holes. He has not the grace in his game common to those whose golf has been nurtured on a Scottish links. The perilous hazards of the Royal and Ancient golf course were not meant for mere ornamentation; if you get into them you must disclose a nice judgment to be well out. In those two bunkers Smith disclosed no skill whatever. The capricious crowd waited for no more, but joined Braid, who was coming up to the adjacent 13th green with "one over fours"; and here we had news of George Duncan, who had tied the new record of yesterday. Braid so far had given nothing away. His golf was perfect from tee to hole; but he had no luck in getting down his approach putts, or he might well have gone home with a seventy. However, with a beautiful three at the 16th, Braid brought his card "within fours." But the 17th hole is no respecter of persons. A topped brassie shot was the beginning of Braid's griefs. His third ran over the ledge into the bunker. He played well out of this, and tried for a longish putt, which failed. This was a six hole, and it left him two strokes down on Duncan, for he had a four on the home green. It was that topped brassie, after a great drive, that brought things to this pass. Everyone seemed to feel the intense strain of the situation.

That Duncan should again become allied with the record of the green was a species of poetic justice to a brilliant golfer. He it was who had begun the record-making with his 73 on Wednesday. Then came Braid and Roberts with similar figures, then Willie Smith with his 71; and now Duncan put in his 71. "Perfect" is something of a hackneyed word in golf, but its application to Duncan's game is wholly just. Far and sure was Duncan. His golf through the green was full of easy and quick judgment. Duncan is a player after the crowd's heart. He makes up his mind and carries out his idea with brilliant execution. His golf reminds one of John Robert's billiards. Its very nonchalance is its fascination. Nothing was better than his pitch and run-up shots. He rarely left himself anything but tolerable putts.

It was a little sad to see the public largely forgetting its old idols—Vardon, Taylor, and Massy, and Mr. John Ball. There were comparatively few spectators to watch the giants who had dropped back in the fight. Still, Harry Vardon, Willie Park, Mr. John Ball, Captain Hutchison, and J. H. Taylor played fine rounds. But who cared?

The crowd hung around the last green to the end, unsatisfied until the very last putt had gone down in an eventful meeting.

It has been a record meeting in many senses—Braid's fifth victory; the five-times beaten record of 75 (set up with the old "gutter" ball ten years ago by Taylor); the flooding of the course on Tuesday. This Jubilee Championship has many things to mark it in history, and amid everything the Royal and Ancient links maintained its charter as affording the most exacting test of real golf that exists.

Appended are the scores of the leaders:—

On this the Daily Mail comments editorially as follows, under the caption "The Importance of Temperament."

The fifth victory of James Braid in the Open Golf Championship is one more illustration of the importance of temperament. Braid, though a most accomplished player, is not such a brilliant performer, on occasions, as some of his competitors, notably Vardon. But he is gifted with that "dour," placid disposition which knows not "nerves," and thus it has fallen to him to accomplish a feat performed by no previous golfer. On his face there appears no sign of dissatisfaction when strokes are going wrong, and no indication of exultation when all is well. It makes absolutely no difference to his steadiness whether he is playing alone or before an enormous crowd, and whether everything or nothing hangs upon his success, except that for crises he always appears to have something in reserve. In a word, he is a man to whom all days are alike, and not one of those who can achieve miracles on "their day," but at other times are apt to fail unaccountably. All golfers will remember how Braid was badly "bunkered" on a South Devon course and was advised by his caddy to pick up the ball and lose two strokes. He looked at the ball and said, "James Braid gives two strokes to no man," and, taking his club, played a perfect stroke down the course.

Such absence of "nerves" and such ability to play with the precision of a machine are the most precious endowments of the sportsman, as valuable in cricket and tennis as in golf. Dr. Grace had these qualities to the full. How often do we see a brilliant eleven fail simply because its members have been seized with "stage-fright" in some such critical moment as that through which Braid passed with triumph. The most famous example is the failure of the English batsmen against Australia in the second test match of 1880, when the score stood at 51 for one wicket in the second innings and only 34 runs were wanted to win. Yet before Spofforth a "rot" set in. No one had the needed steadiness to back up Dr. Grace and England was out with a balance to the bad of seven runs.

It is because sport steadies the nerves that it is of value for the serious business of life, where calm, and the power to think clearly which it connotes, is in emergencies the most valuable factor of success. The greatest soldiers have always been men of equable, unexcitable temperament. Bismarck tells a story of Moltke in the most critical moment of the Battle of Sadowa which illustrates this. Wanting to ascertain whether the great Prussian general was completely master of his nerves, Bismarck thought of this device. He had two cigars in his cigar-case, one good and the other indifferent. He offered the case to Moltke. Without the slightest sign of haste or anxiety Moltke critically examined the cigars and took the better one. Bismarck was reassured. A man capable of this in the roar of four hundred guns was capable of anything. General Grant was like Moltke in this preternatural coolness. "He never showed excitement in battle," said one of his staff; and when he was told of Lincoln's assassination his only—and very characteristic—remark was, "Then I must take the first train to Bordentown." Our own Duke of Wellington commanded such perfect confidence because in the most trying moments he never showed "fluster" or anxiety. And to come down to more recent times, the Japanese officers told Sir Ian Hamilton that the quality which they most prized in their leaders was "calm." The old Roman poet who advised his friend, "aequam memento rebus in arduis servare mentem"—"keep cool in difficulties"—prescribed the temper which wins in life.

A SINGLE BOX OF CUTICURA CURED THREE

Father, Daughter and Baby Boy had Dreadful Itching Rash—Would Scratch Till They Bled and Sleep was Badly Broken—Their Cures

PROVED ECONOMICAL
EASY AND PERMANENT

"My husband has suffered for years at different times with this distressing complaint—a burning, irritating rash on his arms, legs and down the centre of his back. He had tried other remedies but it did no good until he tried Cuticura Ointment. With the first night's use he got more rest for of course he always suffered with it more at night. He would scratch till the pimples bled. He persevered with the Cuticura Ointment every night and within a week he was completely cured. Thanks to Cuticura he has not had any more trouble of the old complaint."

"My little girl, since vaccination, always had a rash. On the lower part of her head and neck would form white patches. I tried a lot of ointments and cold cream for this but they never did much good. She would scratch and make places bleed but she soon stopped her scratching after using Cuticura Ointment for a fortnight. She has had no return of it. She is five years old."

"My baby boy had teething rash on his arms, legs and back for six weeks. It used to keep us both awake all night. He would keep scratching his little legs till he really made them bleed. I used to try different ointments for it. They did not do much good but since using Cuticura my baby hasn't suffered any more with teething rash. It cured him in about a week. It did not take a whole box of Cuticura to cure the lot of them. Mrs. F. Hart, Castle St., Woodbridge, Suffolk, England, Nov. 20, 1909."

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

AN Imperial ordinance promulgates that the revised Customs Tariff will come into effect on and after the 17th July, 1911.

THE Miyatani tunnel on the Kofu railway line, which has been under repair in consequence of the recent breakdown, was restored for traffic on Monday afternoon.

MR OSHIMA, Chief of the Civil Administration Office in Formosa, has tendered his resignation. Mr. Miyao, Chief of the Bureau of Industry, is reported to be his successor.

WE are informed by the Manager of the Yokohama branch of the Chartered Bank that Mr.

William Foot Mitchell, M.P., has accepted a seat on the Board of Directors of the Bank.

SOME 100 female hands of a filature factory at Niigata have gone on strike, demanding higher wages. Over 40 strikers are reported to have been arrested in compliance with the request of the owner of the factory.

It is reported, says the Asahi, that Captain Noguchi Tokutaro, on the retired list, who belongs to the Artillery of the Fourth Division, was arrested a few days ago at Changchun on suspicion of betraying his country's secrets.

A THUNDERSTORM was experienced at Odawara on Wednesday evening. The Imperial villa in which the three Imperial grandsons are staying, was struck by lightning. No serious damage was done, but a tall camphor tree in the garden was thrown down.

THE Marine Products Experimental Institution in Miyazaki prefecture has discovered a promising coral reef running about two miles north to south and another half a mile long running east and west, about 20 miles to the southeast of Orifuzaka, Aoshima mura, Miyazaki district.

IN connection with the Japan-Russia railway and steamship combination-ticket, the following railway stations in Japan are announced as connecting stations:—Yokohama (Hiranuma), Kyoto, Kobe, Moji, Shimonoseki, Tokyo (Shimbashi), Tsuruga (via Vladivostok), and Nagasaki (via Dairen).

A PEKING telegram received by the Asahi says that the Prince Regent has been indisposed for several days past, according to report. The Peking Times reports that His Highness is seriously ill through overwork. This report is not credited, as the Prince daily receives the Grand Councillor.

THE Committee of Inquiry at St. Petersburg regarding the compensation for damages sustained by individuals during the Russo-Japanese War, has concluded its investigations. The number of applications sent in was 36,290, amounting in all to 42,283,971 roubles. Out of that sum, it is said claims covering 3,134,434 roubles were approved.

A BILL is about to be introduced into the Louisiana Legislature for the "absolute suppression of playing bridge." "I am introducing the measure," said Representative Derouen, "for the benefit of children, who rarely have an opportunity to know their bridge-playing mothers. It is also for the benefit of husbands who hardly have a speaking acquaintance with their bridge-playing wives."

THE proposed construction of the Tokyo-Yokohama Canal is still under investigation by the Committee. According to the opinion of the Engineering authorities, though the design of the company plans to make the canal eight feet deep below the surface at ebb-tide, yet the draught of cargo-boats being seven feet or more, it is necessary to make the canal deeper. As to the traversing of the downstream of the Rokugo River there will arise some difficulty, as the sand of the bed of the river will fill in the excavated part, however deep it may be dug. Moreover the canal construction will collide with the interests of the harbour construction, so that the two cannot be made to agree.

THE graduation ceremony of the Kyoto Imperial University has held on Wednesday in the presence of Prince Kitashirakawa, the representative of His Majesty the Emperor, and Mr. Komatsubara, Minister of Education. Diplomas were awarded to 245 graduates, comprising 41 in Law, 78 in Medicine, 35 in Literature, and 91 in Engineering and Natural Philosophy. Three superior graduates received silver watches sent as prizes from His Imperial Majesty.

It will doubtless interest many of the local friends of Mr. J. Chillingham Dunn, formerly of the Vacuum Oil Company, to learn that he was married on the 28th June last, at H.B.M.'s Consulate in Shimonoseki, to Madame Louette La Raines French. We are sure that this latest accession to the ranks of the Benedicts will have the best wishes of his many friends in his new venture. Mr. Dunn is at present on the teaching staff of the Naval College at Etajima.

THE well-known Tokyo watchmakers and jeweller's firm of Tenshodo, 18, Ginza, Tokyo, has just received a telegram from London, informing them that a First Gold Medal has been awarded for their magnificent exhibits of jewellery, sculpture, vases, etc., at the above Exhibition. The great sacrifices made by the firm to worthily represent the jewellers and industrial arts of the Empire have in this instance been crowned with a well-deserved success.

THE International Banking Corporation at Canton recently had a peculiar and rather unpleasant experience. On the 5th inst. the Canton branch of that Bank received a letter from a robber who signed himself Luk Lin Ching, demanding a huge sum of money. The blackmailer, says the correspondent of the S-C Morning Post, is a brother of the notorious robber, Luk Lin Ching. The letter was forwarded to the Consul-General, who communicated with the Viceroy, requesting him to do what might be necessary to put a stop to this sort of nuisance.

ON the 16th instant the Military Balloon Corps went through some evolutions with a balloon at Nasunohara, Shimotsuke province. The balloon is 20 metres in length, 9 metres in height and 7 metres in width. As soon as it was filled with gas, it ascended with three experts, who took with them a telescope and other instruments. In about two and a half hours, the balloon reached the height of 300 metres, keeping at an angle of thirty degrees. The weight of the balloon was over 800,000 momme. In the afternoon several more experiments were carried out, all of which proved successful.

ON the 17th instant the laying of the foundation-stone of the Yokkaichi harbour works was celebrated at the spacious reclaimed ground of the port. About 400 guests, including the representatives of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs, for Home Affairs, and of Agriculture and Commerce, as well as many other high officials and military officers, attended the function. Congratulatory addresses were read by Mr. Arita, Governor of Miye prefecture, and several others. After the ceremony the buffet was opened. In the evening a lantern procession consisting of over 3,000 citizens marched through the streets of the city, and fireworks were displayed off the beach.

THE CONVENTION.

Thursday, July 14.

Tokyo journals naturally comment on the Convention as not in any way justifying the criticisms made of it before its contents had been published. As to the statement that the Convention is intended to be a reply to the American Secretary of State's neutralization scheme, it is confidently alleged that the advisability of concluding such a convention was recognized long before Mr. Knox put forward any protest, and would in fact have been carried into practice at the time of Prince Ito's visit to Mukden, had not his meeting with the Russian Finance Minister been prevented by the assassin's bullet. It is not claimed, as we understand, that a Convention would have actually been negotiated by Prince Ito, but only that the necessary pourparlers would have then taken place. Some critics have claimed that this new Convention is intended to supersede the Convention of 1907, but of course that theory cannot survive the most cursory reference to the text, where it is stated distinctly that the new Convention is "in completion" of the old.

The Mainichi Dempo devotes itself to the disposing of a rumour that the Convention is accompanied by a secret treaty. There is nothing of the sort, according to our Tokyo contemporary. Certain mystery-mongers have stated that Japan has agreed to leave to Russia a free hand in Mongolia, provided that Russia does the same for Japan in Korea. The Mainichi ridicules this idea. It declares that Japan has already acquired the right to deal with Korea as she pleases, and that the talk of a secret treaty is a mere figment of the sensationalists' imagination.

The Asahi Shimbun devotes itself to demonstrating that the two Powers have learned by experience that they have a community of interests in Manchuria, and that competition on either side is naturally injurious. The only quarter in which such competition and friction could arise was in the realm of railways, and it is to the settlement of that part of the situation that the new Convention is chiefly devoted. It is, in truth, a very commonplace document, but agreements which have purely pacific motives are usually commonplace.

The Jiji Shimpō analyses the Convention article by article and shows that the most suspicious reader cannot find any sinister import between the lines of the text. France and England were consulted at every stage of the negotiations and were heartily consenting parties, so that the Convention may be said to have the approval of three of the great Powers of Europe. For the rest it constitutes another guarantee of the Open Door and Equal Opportunity since it confirms and pledges its signatories to maintain the status quo fixed by previous treaties and conventions.

The Mainichi Dempo discusses the question of Germany and Austria's attitude. It construes the interpretations put by these two Powers upon the Convention as an outcome of the Bosnia-Herzegovina complication of last year. On that occasion Austria-Hungary stole a march upon Russia and was supported by her ally, Germany. It is natural therefore that Berlin and Vienna should feel some uneasiness in the presence of a Convention which liberates Russia's forces in the Far-East and enables her to concentrate them in the Near-East. Japan has nothing to do with these European quarrels, her object is merely to act her part in the preservation of Asiatic peace, and Austria and Germany will sooner or later recognize that their attempts to prejudice America against Japan are mistaken policy.

The Kokumin Shimbun declares it to be perfectly natural that two countries, which recently waged terrible war with each other, and which have fully learned the disadvantages and calamities resulting from a breach of peace, should be sincerely solicitous to remove any possible cause of future friction. That is the consideration underlying the new Convention. The high contracting parties are guided solely by a wish to live hereafter on the best possible terms, not only with each other but also with all nations having interests in East Asia. As for Austrian and German comments, they are obviously influenced by considerations with which Japan has nothing to do. In no circumstances could Japan be mixed up in a Balkan complication. The sole object of the new Convention is to guarantee the policy of the Open Door against disturbance of a direct or an indirect character.

The Nippon, after discussing the document point by point, devotes some space to proving that the language of the 3rd article does not contemplate any Third Power. A provision pledging the contracting parties to consult with each other about taking measures in the event of any menace to the status quo is contained in nearly every entente concluded between Japan and Western Powers during the past 15 years. Any country which construes such a provision as specially directed against itself must be construed as having something of an evil conscience.

The Russian Ambassador at the Court of Japan is quoted by the Hochi Shimbun as ridiculing the idea that this Convention had its origin in the action taken by the United States of America a few months ago. No careful reader of history could fall into such a mistake. This Convention is a necessary sequel of the Portsmouth Treaty. The latter document may be said to have been negative in tone, and it required to be supplemented by a positive Convention such as that now concluded. Japan has proved herself great in war, but she has still to build up her industrial and financial systems, and for that purpose peace is essential.

Friday, July 15.

Vladivostok telegraphs that the new Convention is welcomed there with whole-hearted satisfaction. It is spoken of as a gospel of peace, and an earnest hope is expressed that a similar compact may be concluded with China.

The New York Herald seems to have the honour of being absolutely alone among American newspapers in condemning the new Convention. But we gather from the telegraphic intelligence that even that paper is unable to find materials for condemning the Convention as it stands. It is obliged to manufacture a bogie by predicting that this Convention will be speedily followed by another compact of a much more far-reaching nature. We have no right to suppose that the New York Herald has any lack of faith in its own propaganda, but certainly we are justified in describing it as one of the most prominent disturbers of peace and goodwill on earth.

Saturday, July 16.

By this time the opinion of the world with regard to the new Convention has been pretty clearly ascertained. The only doubtful element was Chinese opinion. It was understood that the Viceroy of Manchuria and some other influential personages regarded the Convention with much disfavour as likely to lead to further encroachments by Japan in Manchuria and by Russia in Mongolia. These apprehensions seem to have been conceived before access had been obtained to the actual text of the document, but now that it has been duly published, close examination has failed to find any warrant for previous criticisms. China is therefore calm, though not apparently quite reassured. She is said to be wondering whether the Convention is quite so innocent an affair as its terms suggest.

The German newspaper of Shanghai expresses entire confidence in the friendliness of Russia and Japan, especially the latter, to Germany, and does not believe that the aim of this Convention is to form a quadruple alliance against the old established triple alliance in Europe. At the same time our German contemporary considers that Japan's actions in Manchuria have furnished warrant for a suspicion that she is not altogether faithful to the principle of the Open Door in Manchuria. Instances of this are cited, but the telegraph does not report them in detail. It ends by quoting the German paper as urging Japan to furnish speedy proofs which shall reassure the nations.

A very natural criticism is uttered by the Peking organ of the politicians who agitate for the immediate opening of a national assembly. That paper points out that the signatories of the Convention guarantee the peace of the East, but make no allusion to the leading Power in the Orient. China does not seem to enter their calculations at all. She is quietly put upon the shelf. We call that a natural criticism, and certainly it is not novel. But it certainly strikes us as somewhat shallow. When Japan and Russia pledge themselves to work in the interests of Far Eastern peace, they speak for their own actions alone. Thus the Convention may be paraphrased to read, "The high contracting parties declare that, so far as they are concerned, every effort will be made to prevent an outbreak of war in East Asia." They say nothing about China, simply because their declaration concerns themselves alone, and because it may fairly be presumed that China will be found in the camp of peace so long as her rights are not violated.

We are surprised to learn from a telegram in the Jiji Shimpō that the North-China Daily News writes in a strain distinctly hostile to the Convention. It interprets the document to mean partition of Manchuria between the signatories, since any Power which attempts to interfere will have to face a Russo-Japanese coalition. It further maintains that the prime cause of the Convention was in the first place the world's complaints about Japanese and Russian violations of the Open Door, and in the second place the proposals of the U. S. Government for a programme which would have obviated such abuses.

The Shanghai journal seems to lay upon China's own shoulders the blame for the disastrous position in which she now finds herself. It tells her that an ally or allies were essential to her well-being, but that she has let slip the opportunity of securing the practical sympathy of the West.

A telegram from San Francisco to the Asahi says that, according to the views taken by the State Department in Washington, the new Convention does not in any way impair American interests or menace China's integrity.

Sunday, July 17.

The comments of the Chinese press with regard to the new Convention are specially interesting. The Chungkwō-pao discusses the matter from a somewhat novel standpoint. It lays on China's shoulders the blame for the present situation. All China's international disasters have been caused, in this journal's opinion, by her habit of attempting to play off one Power against another. Thus she enlisted Russia's assistance to bring about the restoration of the Liaotung Peninsula, and the result was war between Russia and Japan, the sequel of the struggle being to place Japan in possession of Liaotung. Then China enlisted the aid of the U. S. of America to effect the neutralization of Manchuria, and the upshot is that the two Powers concerned, namely, Japan and Russia, have joined hands to obliterate Chinese sovereignty altogether in Manchuria. China is pursuing the same suicidal policy in the Yangtze Valley. In order to undermine British influence there the Peking statesmen have manoeuvred to bring France, Germany and the United States into the railway loan, and the certain outcome will be a combination between these four Powers to take the management of affairs into their own hands. The Chungkwō-pao evidently thinks that China's wisest plan would be to conclude a treaty on the closest possible terms with some one or two great Powers, but in our opinion the time for that is past. China has pursued the policy of divide et impera ever since the days of commissioner Yeh, now 60 years ago, and it will be hard to persuade her statesmen to make a radical change now, even if they could find a Power willing to unite with them for the purpose.

The Peking Daily News, which is described by the Mainichi Dempo as being at once the organ of the Waiwupu and of American interests, has struck a curious line of reasoning. It accuses Japan of deliberately violating the 5th Article of the Peking Treaty of 1905, by concluding an agreement with a third Power on the subject of Manchuria, without previously consulting China. It further maintains that beyond all question the new Convention is the answer of Russia and Japan to the neutralization proposals made by the United States. It is shrewdly remarked by the Mainichi Dempo's correspondent, in sending this telegram, that the Peking Daily News seems to have altogether forgotten that China gave a charter for the construction of the Pakumen Railway without at all consulting Japan. Besides, the 5th Article of the Peking Treaty contains no such provision as that indicated by the Daily News.

Mr. Chang, Chinese Representative in Washington, is said to have telegraphed to his Government in the sense that the Convention has effectually put a stop to the Chinchow-Aigun Railway project, which was on the point of being consummated. American capitalists, however, the Minister thinks, will find some other method of placing their money in China. Mr. Chang further remarks that America's benevolent purpose, in proposing the neutralization of the Manchurian Railways, has actually led to a further restriction of China's sovereignty in that region, and that Americans are now expressing sincere regret.

The same Mr. Chang, in an interview with the Mainichi Dempo's representative, is all glib to have stated that China had approached not only America but other Western Powers with a request for aid to preserve Manchuria to her Empire, but, strange to say, none of these Powers seems to comprehend China's inability to make good her claims by means of her own strength.

Tokyo newspapers publish a paragraph to the effect that the Chinese Government has decided to lodge a protest, if it can obtain the coöperation of the Washington Cabinet, to which end the return of Mr. Calhoun from Shanhaikwan has been requested. The Asahi Shimbun, however, denies this rumour, and, indeed, we should think that very little credence attaches to it. There seems to be no doubt, however, that much blame is laid upon the shoulders of Mr. Tsou Chialai, Minister of the Waiwupu, who is supposed to have been responsible in some way or other for not preventing the conclusion of the Convention.

In Russia, public opinion seems to be unreservedly favourable to the Convention. Its conclusion has brought a sincere sense of relief as to the continued peace of East Asia, and no dissentient voice is raised anywhere.

Monday, July 18.

The Chinese seem to be becoming discontented with the Convention the more they examine it. The Manchurian newspaper, the Jipao, has a very strong article which is telegraphed to Tokyo by the Mainichi Dempo's correspondent. It says, in effect, that whereas in the event of war between Japan and Russia, one of the combatants must be defeated, leaving only the other for China to deal with, this agreement means that she has the two upon her shoulders. In fact, the situation is that China has become a guest in her own territory and that Russia and Japan are the hosts. They have gradually deprived China of all her sovereign rights, and they treat her practically as though she deserved little consideration. She has been quietly thrust to the wall in the matter of mining rights, of timber rights, of railway rights, of jurisdiction rights and of navigation rights.

The Mukden Wehyen-pao says that whereas the only hope for China consisted in perfect equality of privileges for all the Powers in Manchuria, this Convention has given the absolute preponderance to Japan and Russia, and it is therefore a document hostile to the interests of all the States except its signatories.

Turning to Peking, the telegraph says that when the representatives of Russia and Japan repaired to the Waiwupu to report the conclusion of the Convention, they were received by Mr. Hu Weitieli, who formerly presided over the Chinese Legation in Tokyo. Mr. Hu is said to have complained that although the Convention related to Chinese territory no notice of its negotiation had been given beforehand to China. To this Mr. Ijuin is said to have replied that as the prime purpose of the Convention is to ensure the preservation of peace in the East, China will be the Power to benefit most largely by it. He further pointed out that when two States enter into an agreement they do not necessarily take a third Power into their previous confidence, as China herself had shown on more than one occasion in the past. As for the Russian Chargé d'Affairs, he is reported to have stated that the excellent relations previously existing between Russia and China had not been fostered by the latter Power, and consequently Russia had turned to Japan. (We reproduce this statement as it is telegraphed, but we greatly doubt whether any credence should attach to it.)

The Viceroy of Manchuria is said to have telegraphed to Peking that, the Convention being a fait accompli, nothing can be done to upset it. Therefore the only course for China to pursue is to develop her strength by general reforms, and thus acquire confidence to exact her rights.

The Asahi's Peking correspondent wires that it was believed that China would endorse the Convention on condition that its operation did not interfere with the policy of the Open Door and Equal Opportunity, but the latest phase is that the American and the German representatives are busying themselves very assiduously, and that the outcome of their energy suggests some uneasiness.

The Peking Daily News is quoted as writing in an incendiary strain. It declares that the Convention was dictated by the action of the United States; that Manchuria has actually passed out of the hands of China, and that the latter is henceforth practically precluded from engaging in any important enterprise in the Three Eastern Provinces, whether by her own unaided strength, or with the assistance of another Power. The same journal publishes what is alleged to be a treaty secretly signed, on 19 December 1905, between China and Japan, according to which Japan had pledged herself to give notice to China in the event of any future agreement with regard to linking up the South-Manchuria and the East-China Railways. The Peking journal claims that Japan has now violated the secret convention, but the world will observe that nothing has hitherto been said about this alleged convention, although negotiations for uniting the two systems of railways have been going on for more than a year.

The Asahi Shimbun has a very moderate article on the subject. It hints plainly that the prime responsibility for the Convention rests with China herself. It may be true that the various treaties and notes furnished opportunities for obstructiveness, but it is certainly true that China utilized these opportunities in a manner that did not suggest any very marked respect for the vested interests of Russia and Japan in Manchuria. Japan has no wish to attach any exaggerated importance to such incidents or to employ them as any pretence for unfriendly action towards her neighbour, but she does wish that China should pay more attention to the value of sympathy in international dealings, since otherwise there is danger of estranging her friends. If she showed towards foreign Powers an attitude such as that displayed by her to the Japanese business-men who recently visited her, she would gain universal goodwill. Our contemporary concludes by saying that Japan will be perfectly content should rumour be found to speak truly when it represents China as willing to endorse the Convention so long as it does not impair the principle of the Open Door and Equal Opportunity.

YOKOHAMA CITY SENDS CONGRATULATIONS.

The Russo-Japanese Convention having been published, Mr. Saito, acting Mayor of Yokohama, sent a congratulatory telegram on the 14th instant to the Japanese and the Russian Ministers for Foreign Affairs, the Japanese Ambassador at St. Petersburg, and the Russian Ambassador in Tokyo, stating that the new Convention will not only assure permanent peace between the two nations, but will strengthen their friendship, while their commerce will be developed. To this the Russian Ambassador sent the following reply:—

"TO THE ACTING MAYOR OF YOKOHAMA.

"Very sensible of your kind congratulations; am sincerely gratified with your conviction equally shared by me of strengthening friendship and future development of commerce between the two nations. —Malewsky."

FORMOSA.

Thursday, July 14.

News sent from the front on the 12th inst. showed that two Japanese companies were then engaged in attempting to dislodge the aborigines from Shinarek mountain. They had taken possession of the lower half of the hill when they were attacked from the rear by a body of the aborigines. This necessitated the use of the reserves, and the final issue is not reported, though the telegram adds that the occupation of the mountain will probably be achieved soon, and that an excellent gun-position will thus be secured. There is no change in the general situation. The aborigines still seem determined to concentrate their forces for final resistance in the Gaogan district.

Some officers who were sent from Taipeh to inspect and report upon the conditions existing at the front have returned to headquarters, and are quoted as saying that no idea can be formed of the topographical difficulties without actually visiting the place. To a height of 3,000 feet the hills are covered with trees, growing so thickly that the sunlight never penetrates, and the undergrowth makes almost an impassable jungle. Looking for an enemy in such places is like searching for wild beasts, especially when the enemy wears no clothes and is skilled in hiding himself behind every root and trunk. The only method of scouting is by means of aborigines who have surrendered, and, strange to say, these are allowed to come and go freely between the two camps. The aborigines do their shooting from ranges of 10 or 20 yards, and therefore every bullet takes effect. But fortunately they are getting very scarce of ammunition.

The Emperor evidently regards with much sympathy the troops in Formosa, for His Majesty has ordered Lieut.-General Baron Nakamura, Chief of the Chamberlain Section, to proceed to the Island with presents for the forces.

Friday, July 15.

The capture of Shinarek mountain seems to be a task of immense difficulty. The only path for ascending the hill lies between precipitous rocks and is so narrow that one man can defend it against a host. The aborigines have suspended large stones so that they can be dropped at a moment's notice on the heads of men approaching. Little progress seems to have been made in carrying this position. It is evidently regarded with great importance by the aborigines, who are making every effort to defend it. The Japanese troops, however, are advancing from four different directions, and there are said to be signs of the enemy weakening. With the aborigines is a band of 70 or 80 Chinese adventurers, who, knowing that their own fate depends upon keeping the Japanese at arm's length, are doing everything in their power to incite the aborigines. Meanwhile the Keito men who have their habitat near the sources of the Dakusui River and who have hitherto been hesitating which side to join, have now definitely thrown in their lot with the Japanese.

The official reports this morning (14th inst.) convey no clear information. They indicate merely that desultory conflicts are going on in the eastern section of the field, and that the advance in the western section is not meeting with much opposition.

Saturday, July 16.

The operations in Formosa are beginning to assume something of a more decisive character. Under the guidance of a friendly aborigine the Japanese troops have captured 15 of the enemy's defensive positions, and have inflicted heavy loss on them. Not, however, without a considerable number of casualties on the Japanese side also, for they had 14 killed and 16 wounded. On the side of the Aiyu, who were erecting the wire entanglements, there were 3 wounded. There is no accurate record of the losses suffered by the aborigines, but they are believed to have been very heavy.

Tuesday, July 19.

The operations in Formosa have not yet led to a signal result. Shinarek Hill is still held by the aborigines, and in other directions, also, no marked advantages have been gained. The Japanese, however, are advancing inch by inch, and a decisive result cannot be long deferred.

Wednesday, July 20.

Telegrams from Taipeh announce that the 7th Company of infantry resumed its advance against Shinarek Mountain on the 13th inst., and continued it throughout the 16th and a part of the 17th, during a fierce gale of wind and rain. The summit was finally crowned on the forenoon of the 17th inst., with a loss of 20 killed and wounded. The casualties on the side of the aborigines, so far as they have been ascertained, seem to have been very small, namely two killed and one wounded.

Twenty-one Japanese newspapers have combined to open subscription lists for the benefit of the troops engaged in the Formosa campaign. Any sum of money from 10 sen upward will be received.

Thursday, July 21.

The news is confirmed that Shinarek Hill was captured on the 18th inst. and there is intelligence that the Japanese troops, after crowning the hill, pushed forward to a distance of some 220 metres and took possession of a hamlet of 20 huts hitherto occupied by the aborigines. The casualties on the Japanese side are put at 8 killed and 14 wounded, but what period of time this list covers, the telegram does not state distinctly. It would further appear that the operations were considerably influenced by the weather. A gale of such violence raged during two days that the aborigines abandoned the field, whereas the Japanese held their ground and thus gained a decided advantage. In fact the 17th company, which is operating in the Gilan district, took advantage of the gale during the night of the 16th inst., and pushing forward from Bonbon Hill captured an important stronghold of the aborigines who were conspicuous by their absence. On the 17th the weather partially cleared but the enemy did not put in an appearance.

From Shinchiku the news is that the storm blew with almost uninterrupted violence from the 16th to the 18th instant, and that even the petty rivulets traversing the valleys swelled to tumultuous streams so that communication became extremely arduous and often impossible. During this hurricane the aborigines were observed throwing up defences at two or three points, but with the exception of an exchange of rifle shots at long range there were no military operations. The health of the troops in this region is said to be excellent. There are only 15 on the sick list, and 15 undergoing treatment for wounds.

THE SOUTH POLE EXPEDITION.

The Minister of State for the Navy and the Vice-Minister have both expressed emphatic disapproval of Lt. Shirase's scheme for journeying to the South Pole. They say that the preparations contemplated are not nearly adequate for the purpose. The Lieut. proposes to start with a sailing ship of 200 tons. But it is evident that in the circumstances which will certainly be encountered a ship must have some means of propulsion independent of the capricious wind and still more uncertain currents. In fact, a sailing ship attempting to negotiate the Antarctic Seas might find herself condemned to perpetual drifting. As for the idea of carrying horses to be used for purposes of land transport and for food if necessary, it is plain that there could be very little space to accommodate horses on board a 200 ton vessel. Then again, no provision is made for carrying barley, although experiences have proved that sailors fed entirely upon rice lose 50 per cent. of their number from kakke. Lt. Shirase is not even acquainted with the exact route to be followed, and it is plain that a sailing vessel surrounded by icebergs and governed solely by the winds and currents would soon find herself in a perilous state. In fact the naval authorities, speaking through the mouth of Commander Ide, have pronounced the death-sentence on Lt. Shirase's scheme.

SAN FRANCISCO.

San Francisco news-mongers are really surpassing themselves on this occasion. They are busily circulating rumours that Berlin has assumed a most resolute attitude with reference to the continent of America, and has announced its intention of exercising a free hand alike in the north, the south and the centre of that continent. San Francisco paragraphists naturally interpret this in the sense of a direct blow given to the Monroe doctrine and predict that serious trouble will ensue. This is not, however, the limit of their inventions. They go on to say that beyond doubt some secret understanding has been arrived at between Germany and Japan with reference to this new development.

We do not think of insulting our readers' intelligence by pointing out the absurdities of such canards. The curious thing is that people should be found capable of circulating falsehoods so palpable.

KOREA.

Friday, July 15.

The Koreans are naturally unable to find in the new Convention any food for apprehension. In fact, nothing is more remarkable in the document than its total silence about Korea. The Koreans are probably right in inferring that the high contracting parties saw no reason to make any further allusion to the affairs of the Peninsula.

It is expected that Mr. Cho, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce in the Korean Government, will proceed to Chemulpo to meet the new Resident-General.

The Chuo Shimbun has a telegram from Seoul which says that some uneasiness had been felt in foreign consular circles with reference to the effect of amalgamation on the customs' duties. Apprehensions on this score have however been allayed on learning that in any circumstances the extra-territorial system will remain in force some time.

It is alleged that the Daihan-Hyop-hoi and two other Korean parties have decided to combine against the Il Ching-hoi. But on what platform the combination is to stand, we do not perceive, inasmuch as the view attributed to the leaders is that the time has passed when any struggle for independence could have been successful.

Saturday, July 16.

Some inconvenience has been caused in Korea by the absence of all the principal police officials from their posts. These had been summoned to Seoul for the purpose of discussing some arrangements connected with the transfer of police authority, and it is stated that the utmost expedition will now be used in sending them back to the places of their service preparatory to the redistribution of the force.

A curious statement appears in a telegram sent to the Mainichi Dempo from Seoul. It is to the effect that whenever anything unusual occurs in Korea or is expected to occur, a number of Japanese loafers always flock to the Peninsula. These people bring their country into so much disrepute that the Residency-General is now considering measures to restrain their movements.

Sunday, July 17.

The returned students from Japan are beginning to make their presence felt in Seoul. They have been paying visits to various statesmen and urging the necessity of taking some step to preserve the country's independence, but it appears that they have found no sympathiser. They are now talking in a senseless and juvenile tone about burning foreign consulates and murdering their inmates, so as to involve Japan in trouble with outside Powers. The police are keeping a sharp eye upon these gentry.

Mr. Wakabayashi, former Chief of Police in Korea, who has now been appointed Governor of Nara prefecture, is quoted as saying that the Koreans in Seoul have at length come to understand Japan's intentions towards them and are fully persuaded of the suicidal policy of attempting any physical demonstration.

Tuesday, July 19.

It is reported from Seoul that the powers of the Residents have been largely abridged. The particular functions of which they have been deprived are the expulsion of objectionable characters from the Peninsula; the suspension of newspapers, and the granting of passports to foreigners. Stripped of these duties, the Residents are limited to municipal functions and to matters connected with the transfer of lands. It is thought that this measure precludes a radical alteration in the organization of the Residencies.

The Mainichi Dempo's Seoul correspondent wires that practically the whole of the duties connected with quelling the insurrection have been entrusted to the gendarmerie, the police being limited to the office of preserving law and order in the ordinary acceptance of those terms. This appears to us to be a measure consistent with the dictates of experience.

Wednesday, July 20.

No less than 13 persons have been arrested in Seoul on a charge of inciting to sedition. They are all youths who studied in Japan, and who, returning to their country last year, have, since that time, been acting the part of idle loafers and preaching an anti-Japanese propaganda. It is believed that the number of these sedition-mongers will receive a large increment when the Korean students who have just graduated in Tokyo return to their homes, and correspondingly stringent precautions are being taken by the Authorities.

The assassin Yi Chai myong has bowed to the justice of his condemnation and has requested that his body should be handed over, after execution, to his family. No act in his career becomes him so well as this acknowledgment of the justice of his fate. But for our own part we can only repeat what we have already said more than once, namely that as a matter of policy it would, in our opinion, be much wiser to incarcerate this class of criminal for life instead of resorting to the extreme penalty of the law. That the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church holds true eminently in the case of political assassins. They are just as firmly convinced of the piety and propriety of their acts as any religious fanatic could be. In fact, the crown of their career is a violent death at the hands of those whom they regard as tyrants and oppressors. Moreover, if the circle of their secret sympathisers could be measured it would be found very extensive. The best way to treat these unhappily misguided folks is to put them quietly out of sight, not in the grave, but in some penal settlement where the rest of their lives may be passed in complete obscurity.

The new Resident-General, travelling by the warship Yakumo and escorted by the Yodo, is to arrive at Chemulpo on the 23rd inst. Viscount Terauchi and the rest of the family are to travel via Fusan.

The talk now is that the office of Resident will be completely abolished, and by this step as well as by other readjustments a large annual expenditure will be dispensed with. The idea is said to be—we take these statements from the Nippon—that the Residencies are useless remnants of the Consular system, and that after the incorporation of Korea into the Japanese Empire such an office will become a functionless sinecure.

Thursday, July 21.

Three hundred Korean residents in Vladivostok are said to have addressed to Marquis Katsura a memorial strongly protesting against amalgamation.

There is another telegram from Seoul with reference to the arrest of seditious students. It will be remembered that the first message, published on the 20th inst., spoke of 13 being apprehended, but this second message puts the number at 10 and says that they are students from the Universities of Waseda, Meiji and Chuwo. The police are said to be very busy and it is thought more than probable that the examination of these students will lead to further arrests.

On several occasions during the past 3 months allusions have been made to fishing operations undertaken under the auspices of the Oriental Development Company, in the North-western waters of Korea. This enterprise promised to be very successful and quite a fleet of boats were equipped for the purpose of taking part in it. A prime necessity, however, was the provision of means for marketing the fish, and in granting a permit for carrying on the industry the Oriental Development Co. inserted a strict clause with reference to this subject. But the concessionaires are said to have entrusted a monopoly of the sale to the Isana Company, and the directors of that concern took no thought for anything except their own profits, so that the actual fishermen soon found themselves faring very badly. In fact it is alleged that scores of fishermen are reduced to a condition of penury.

AN IMPERIAL PRINCE.

Japanese newspapers devote much space to an event which was not uncommon in former times, namely the descent of an Imperial Prince into the rank of commoners. The Prince concerned is Teruhisa, son of Prince Kitashirakawa, who was adopted some time ago into the Komatsu family, and who will now abandon his title of Prince and become Marquis Komatsu. The incident has a certain element of romance. It appears that the Prince applied, some years ago, to be admitted to the Jishu-sha, a school established by Marquis Inouye in the immediate vicinity of his residence at Uchidayama. This school is conducted on the severest lines. The students are all taken from the nobility and are obliged to lead lives of the most austere character; rising early, studying hard, faring coarsely, receiving only a pittance of pocket-money, never using a jinrikisha and always travelling third class on railways. There was some difficulty in admitting Prince Teruhisa to such an institution, but the young man's insistence prevailed, and his subsequent conduct justified his admission. He observed all the rules of the school with the utmost strictness, and in 1906 he passed into the naval college, from which he has just graduated with honours, and has taken his voyage in the training-ship. He always obeyed strictly his resolve not to allow his rank to interfere in any way with his education, and he now enters the navy as a midshipman without any fuss or pretence whatever. On the 20th inst. the ceremony of divesting him of his princely rank took place at the Palace, and thereafter he paid a visit to all the Imperial Princes, with whom he will no longer associate on equal terms. This is the first instance of such an occurrence during the Meiji era.

At 9.13 a.m. on the 18th instant a slight shock of earthquake was felt in Yokohama, lasting two minutes and twenty-two seconds. The oscillations were rapid, running principally in a S.S.E. and N.N.W. direction.

THE MACAO AFFAIR.

Friday, July 15.

Hongkong telegraphs a strange piece of intelligence. It says that the Portuguese troops on Kalowan Island near Macao were recently attacked by a force of 300 Chinese pirates. After a fierce engagement lasting for a considerable time the Portuguese were compelled to retreat, but the arrival of a gun boat changed the situation and enabled them to drive the pirates back. Another account of the same affair sounds more credible. It is to the effect that the attack was made by a body of Portuguese troops sent from Macao for the purpose. The Chinese pirates had abducted a number of children whom they held for a ransom of 35,000 taels. Applications having been made to the Governor of Macao by the unfortunate parents, and His Excellency having been informed that failing payment the pirates threatened to kill the children, a battalion of troops with a gun-boat was at once sent from Macao. How the resulting contest eventuated the telegram does not show clearly. It speaks of much destruction wrought by the gun-fire of the Portuguese and of a part of the Island still remaining in possession of the pirates, but we gather that the fighting was not very severe, for the Portuguese had only 3 men killed and 4 wounded.

Saturday, July 16.

The telegrams this morning (16th inst.) indicate that the origin of the disturbance at Macao was the abduction of seven Chinese children by the pirates of the Calowan Islands. The children were held for a ransom of 35,000 dollars, and their parents having made complaints to the Portuguese Authorities, a force was sent from Macao to procure the return of the children. The islanders, however, seem to have taken sides with the pirates, and the Portuguese troops were repulsed. They therefore proceeded to bombard the island from gun-boats, and of course great damage was caused. The Portuguese are said to have lost 1 man killed and 9 wounded. Application was made to Canton and the Chinese sent down some troops and ships, which, however, appear to have refrained from taking any active part in the fight and to be merely lying off for the purpose of capturing any pirates who may attempt to escape.

Sunday, July 17.

The news this morning is that the Portuguese troops have captured a village from the piratical Chinese and have released a number of kidnapped women and children, among them being six of the children whose abduction was the proximate cause of this disturbance. A boatload of pirates have also been captured when attempting to effect their escape, and it is believed that among the prisoners is the pirate chief.

Another telegram says that the Portuguese opened fire on a boat which was engaged in conveying ammunition to the pirates. Out of the crew of 13 on board the boat, three were captured, and the remainder either were killed or escaped by swimming. It appears that the Portuguese Authorities deem it necessary to destroy a village which has served as a haunt of the pirates, and a quantity of kerosene oil has been sent from Macao to facilitate the burning of the village.

All accounts agree that the pirates are in great straits and that their final expulsion from the district is assured. It is thought probable that the delimitation problem will be once more brought vividly upon the tapis by these incidents, for the island of Calowan is just on the disputed boundary line, and neither Power has been exercising efficient jurisdiction there.

Monday, July 18.

A strange telegram comes from Peking. It says that at some date prior to the 11th inst., a Chinese squadron attacked the Portuguese gun-boats lying off Hengchin Island, and inflicted a loss of over 10 killed and wounded. The Governor of Macao at once despatched reinforcements which bombarded the island and caused many casualties. Since then the two squadrons have been lying off the island without engaging in further hostilities. It is by the inhabitants of this island that the pirates are said to be harboured.

Another telegram received in Tokyo says that Canton has sent 1,000 men and 6 gunboats to the scene. The geography of the region is so obscure that it is difficult to form any clear conception of what is going on, but, so far as we can gather, the facts are that the frontier population are harbouring the pirates, and the Portuguese have taken the law into their own hands against both the pirates and the population, which action the Chinese resent as ultra vires.

Tuesday, July 19.

The trouble at Macao seems to have developed considerable dimensions. The whole of the inhabitants of the island of Hengchin, to the number of 2,000, are said to be taking part with the pirates, and the Portuguese force available is quite inadequate to carry the Chinese stronghold by assault. Nothing is said as to the nature of the stronghold, but we conjecture it to be an ordinary walled city. Failing competence to land a strong party, three Portuguese gunboats bombarded the island on the 16th and 17th inst., but the effect was not decisive, and an invitation to surrender elicited a defiant reply. It is stated that 4 other Portuguese warships, as well as 14 Chinese, are anchored at Macao. The Chinese are reported to be limiting their operations to preventing the escape of the pirates into Chinese territory, but we are unable to discover why the 4 Portuguese warships do not take part in the bombardment of the island, unless it be that their presence at Macao is considered necessary for protective purposes. Up to the 17th instant, the Portuguese casualties are put at 50 killed and wounded, and 70 Chinese have been captured. The Vasco de Gama had set out on her voyage for Japan when she was recalled by wireless telegraphy, and she appears to have proceeded to Macao from Hongkong.

It is evident that no truth whatever attaches to the telegrams in our last issue indicating that a collision had occurred between the Chinese Imperial forces and the Portuguese. On the contrary, the former are co-operating with the latter against the pirates.

A telegram sent on the morning of the second bombardment of the island, spoke of the pirates' sources of supply as having been cut off, so that their surrender can be only a matter of time.

It may be observed that the seas where this affair is occurring have long been the scene of disputes between foreign Powers and China about boundary delimitation. England has been embarrassed in several attempts to extirpate the pirates who infest the vicinity of Canton; but the Portuguese have fared similarly, and every one remembers that the Tatsu Maru complication was due in part to uncertainty as to the confines of Chinese and Portuguese territory. The Chinese are now co-operating with the Portuguese to eradicate the pirates, but when the incident is closed we shall doubtless hear of a renewal of the boundary dispute.

Wednesday, July 20.

The bombardment of Hengchen island in Kwolu Bay was resumed on the morning of the 19th inst. and the Portuguese landed 150 marines from two warships. The pirates appear to have been driven from their last refuge, but it is not yet stated that they have surrendered. At the date of latest advices the Portuguese marines were operating against the stronghold last occupied by the pirates, a piece of intelligence which does not explain itself easily; for, if the pirates have evacuated the position, there should be no occasion to assault it.

Thursday, July 21.

Apparently the reports reaching Peking about the doings of the Portuguese at Hengchin Island are of a different character from the accounts which have found their way to the public ear. We gather this quite incidentally. Telegrams from Peking say that on the 18th inst. a council of high officials was held in that city to discuss the situation in Cantonese waters. Mr. Wu Yu shang, an official of the Waiwupu, urged that in view of the barbarous conduct of the Portuguese forces, no hesitation should be shown in ordering the Chinese warships to attack the Portuguese squadron. This decisive step was opposed, however, by Messrs Na Tung and Shih Hsu, whose opinion was that the better plan would be to order the Chinese ships to hold themselves in readiness, and in the meanwhile to open negotiations with the Portuguese Legation. From this it must be inferred that the methods adopted by the Portuguese against the pirates have involved harsh treatment of innocent folks. The telegrams further state that numerous letters of protest and remonstrance are reaching Peking from leading citizens of Canton, and that the Cantonese residents of the metropolis are about to hold a general meeting for the purpose of expressing their indignation. In the accounts hitherto forwarded via Hongkong we have not found any evidence of inhuman conduct on the part of the Portuguese forces, but if the above news be trustworthy, the information received by the Chinese Authorities conveys an evil impression. Great Britain during the past 50 years has steadily supported Portugal in the Far East, and the probability is that her good offices as a mediator will be solicited by both sides in this instance.

Hongkong telegraphs that owing to the severity and accuracy of the fire from the Portuguese gun-boats, there were many casualties among the pirates, and those that were not wounded or killed were for the most part taken prisoners. Several surrendered and it is added that the wounded are receiving treatment at the Portuguese hospital at Macao. So far as military operations are concerned, the affair may be said to have terminated, and two of the Portuguese gunboats returned to Hongkong on the 19th inst. If this news be correct, as we have no reason to doubt, the danger of a collision between the two squadrons may be said to have been averted. It is quite possible that the fire from the Portuguese gun-boats destroyed innocent people as well as pirates. The difficulty of discrimination in such cases is very great, but onlookers seldom recognize it immediately, and it is perhaps owing to this cause that the Chinese of Canton are sending indignant letters to Peking.

THE U.S. SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. Dickinson, the U. S. Secretary of War, arrived at Yokohama on the 15th inst. by the steamer Siberia, and was met by General Count Oku, Chief of the General Staff, representing the War Department. Various functions have been arranged to welcome the illustrious visitor, among them a reception at the U.S. Embassy on the evening of the 16th, and a luncheon party in the Arsenal Garden on the 17th.

Mr. McG. Dickinson, the U.S. Secretary for War, with Mrs. Dickinson, General and Mrs. C. R. Edwards, and Secretary L. R. Clarke, arrived at Yokohama at 2:30 p.m. on the 15th inst., on board the steamer Siberia. No sooner had the vessel entered the harbour than the distinguished visitors were received on board by the representatives of the War and Foreign Offices; Master of Ceremonies Hachisuka; Mr. Hori, Secretary of Kanagawa prefecture; Mr. Saito, acting Mayor of Yokohama, and members of the U.S. Embassy and Consulate-General. As the party passed by the U.S. gunboat Wheeling on board a steam launch, a salute of nineteen guns was fired by the gunboat. After landing at the pier, the party drove to the Consulate, whence they proceeded to Tokyo.

On the 16th inst. Mr. Tokutomi, Vice-Minister of the International Press Association, repaired to the U.S. Embassy and presented the following address to the Secretary of State for War in the name of the Press Association:—

The International Press Association of Japan, composed of representatives of the Press of many nations and organized for the express purpose of promoting good relations and good understanding between newspaper-men and between their respective countries, begs to be permitted to share in this welcome to Your Excellency as a distinguished visitor from a neighbouring and a friendly shore.

While this address is extended by the entire body in the full belief that the visit of so high an official must assist in the promotion of better understanding and good relationship, the representatives of the Japanese Press, officers and members of this organization, especially and on behalf of the Press of Japan, extend to Your Excellency a most heartfelt and sincere welcome.

We, as representatives of the Japanese Press, particularly desire to draw Your Excellency's attention to this fact, because we would have it well understood by Your Excellency, Your Excellency's Government, people and Press, that the newspapers of Japan have nothing but good-will and kindly feeling for America, and would through Your Excellency assure the newspaper-men of your country that among the fraternity in Japan there is a keen desire to promote good relations with your country and their newspaper brethren over the sea.

We trust Your Excellency's visit to Japan, though all too short, must be a pleasant one. We know that it will contribute to the good relations between the two countries and the peace of the world.

"We welcome the coming and we speed the parting guest." May Your Excellency's tour around the world be pleasant and may you return safe to your own country to pursue that course in connection with your Government, which has been, and we feel will be, marked with much honour and high ability.

The Secretary of War and Mrs. Dickinson were received in audience by the Emperor and Empress on the 16th inst. and were subsequently entertained at a luncheon in the palace. That evening a banquet followed by a reception was given at the U.S. Embassy.

At a banquet given to the U.S. Secretary of War in the official mansion of the Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs on the 13th inst., Count Komura made the following speech:—

YOUR EXCELLENCIES, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—I deem it both a privilege and an honour to be given this opportunity of extending to the Honorable Secretary of War of the United States, in the name of my country and my countrymen, a cordial welcome to Japan.

It has been our good fortune on several occasions in the past, to have with us Mr. Dickinson's worthy predecessor, the present honoured Chief Magistrate of the Great Republic. We recall with lively satisfaction the pleasant visit of President Taft, not only because of his personality which endears him to all, but because of his wide experience, keen insight and calm judgment, which enabled him to appreciate at their true value the sentiments of friendship and perfect confidence entertained by Japan for the United States. We are well convinced that his clear and accurate knowledge of the actual conditions in Japan has contributed in a marked degree to the consolidation of good relations between the two countries, and, knowing our own hearts and inclinations, we cannot doubt but that Mr. Dickinson will find, during his all too short sojourn with us, good and sufficient reasons for sharing the views and convictions of his revered Chief.

Unhappily the forces of evil, for unknown but sinister purposes, are constantly endeavouring, by false reports and other methods, to create conditions of ill-will and distrust between the two neighbouring peoples. Our relations of friendship and good understanding are too firmly established and our interests are too distinct to admit of the possibility of any question arising between Japan and the United States that will not readily yield to the ordinary processes of diplomacy. Increased and more intimate exchange of views between the two Governments will dispel all apprehensions on that score.

Accordingly we congratulate ourselves upon the practice inaugurated by President Taft which enables high and responsible officials of the United States to visit Japan. We sincerely hope that Mr. Dickinson in following that practice may often give us the opportunity of welcoming both himself and Mrs. Dickinson to our shores.

Mr. and Mrs. Dickinson, we wish you both a pleasant and interesting trip and a safe return to your native land.

Mr. Dickinson replied in the following terms:—

COUNT KOMURA, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—I cannot adequately express to you the deep appreciation of myself and those with me of the cordial reception we are experiencing at your hands. And yet, what else could we anticipate from the well-known hospitality of Japan, and what other exponent could there be of the traditional friendship that has always existed between our people?

You have, Count Komura, given a very clear and just analysis of the characteristics of our President and of his attitude toward your country. It is fortunate, not merely for the American people, but I believe for the whole civilized world, that we have now at the head of our Government a man who is so well versed in affairs of the East. Until a very recent time America was, in a certain sense, almost as much a hermit nation as was Japan when our Commodore Perry came to your shores. That is to say, we were a people who confined our governmental activities to our own borders, reaching out merely in those directions to which our commerce led us. But we, like you, have in recent years taken on higher responsibilities, and have assumed toward the nations of the world the attitude of a first-class Power. With that attitude and its attendant responsibilities, it would be unfortunate if we had at the head of our great nation a man of flighty disposition, one who could be easily carried off his feet by sensational rumours and suggestions, and who did not well understand the present relations between these two great countries and the attitude which they should maintain, and doubtless will maintain, in the future in pursuing their respective careers.

Our present Chief Executive was called by President McKinley to be Governor of the Philippines, and in that capacity and afterwards, he had unusual opportunities of being trained in a line of thought and experience that hitherto has come to but few of our American citizens. To have a man of that training and with the level head, sound judgment and ability to see things in their true perspective and relations at the head of our affairs, is a fortunate thing for America; and I believe I may say it is fortunate for Japan as well, in that he will be able to put a true estimate upon all suggestions that might tend to disturb the relations between the two countries.

I think that you have justly and truly said that there is no reason why the careers of these two countries should not be pursued on parallel lines—with a certain rivalry, to be sure, but a rivalry which may be pursued in friendship, without involving conflicting interests of a disturbing character.

There is every reason why amity and cordial relations should exist between us, and to my mind there is no reason why other conditions should intervene. It is for the broad-minded, patriotic people, who are the leaders of thought in these two countries, to dominate the situation and see that the people are not misled by false light or sinister suggestions into an attitude which is hostile to their true interests and which could not be justified on any rational ground.

The American people, while in a certain sense a warlike people, are yet great lovers of peace. I think I may justly say that their history illustrates that there is no more peace-loving people, or one more inclined to the principles of arbitration in the settlement of international disputes. Many differences are now willingly submitted to the character of adjudication which were formerly thought to be terminable only by resort to arms. Having such ideals, we may well hope to look forward in the future to the preservation of that friendship which up to the present time has been maintained, and to see it cemented with still stronger and closer ties.

I wish to express to you the pleasure we have already had, although we have just reached your hospitable shore. I am sure that our only regret will be that our time is so limited that we cannot take advantage of many of the opportunities afforded to the visitor by a country so replete with historic interest, and so pulsing with the life of the most extraordinary development that has ever come to a people.

On Sunday evening the Secretary of War and his party left Shimbashi for Kyoto, whence they will proceed to the Philippines.

We may here mention that the Mainichi Shimbun seizes the opportunity of Mr. Dickinson's presence to expose some of the flagrant errors in Mr. Millard's work, and to express the hope that the Secretary of War, however brief his stay in Japan, will be able, on his return home, to tell his countrymen how greatly they are misled by writers like Messrs. Millard and Straight.

FORESTS ALONG THE YALU.

The Governor of the Champah region has memorialized the Viceroy of Manchuria with reference to lumber operations on the Yalu River. At present this enterprise is conducted by a semi-official company of dual character, the Chinese and the Japanese being equally interested. The Company's charter authorizes it to fell timber within a belt 20 miles wide along the western bank of the river. But it appears that the timber growing within those limits is not very fine or plentiful, as may easily be conceived when we remember that the river is the only means of carriage and that trees growing near it would therefore be the first to attract the attention of lumber-men. The Champah Governor suggests that the operations of the Company probably extend to points considerably outside the 20 mile limit, and urges that steps should be taken at once to clearly define the boundaries. He adds that if this were done, and if a proper system of afforestation were inaugurated side by side with the felling of timber, a substantial increase would accrue to the Mukden revenue. He also says that outside the 20-mile limit the forests are practically inexhaustible.

CHINA.

Thursday, July 14.

The negotiations about the limits of the Fushun Mine are still proceeding, but the demands of both sides are said to be as far as ever from reconciliation.

It is stated that the Chinese are finding some difficulty in putting up their share of the capital of the Penhsihu Mine. The Viceroy has opened negotiations with a Chinese bank.

The Antung-Kekwang-shan section of the Mukden-Antung Railway, the length of which section is 50 miles, has been pushed on with great celerity, and according to present expectation it will be open to traffic from the 3rd of November.

The veto upon the export of cattle from Shantung is said to be causing some inconvenience to the Japanese in Manchuria and the residents in Vladivostok. One probable effect is that the export of oxen from Korea will increase, but as the supply of horned cattle in that country is limited, the action of the Shantung authorities may be productive of some inconvenience sooner or later.

Friday, July 15.

The publication of the text of the new Convention has been received calmly in China, according to telegrams published by the Tokyo press. In diplomatic circles and by Chinese statesmen the Convention is not thought to contain anything of special import to China. It is regarded rather as a natural sequence of the Portsmouth Treaty and as disposing of questions which the latter left unsettled.

Under the heading of "Failure of the Mint Project," the leading journals of Tokyo publish a telegram from Peking saying that the Government Printing Bureau has failed signally in achieving the purpose of its creation. The Bureau was formed for the purpose of issuing new bank notes; a sum of 600,000 taels was placed at the disposal for this purpose, and an American expert engaged to superintend the designing and printing of the notes. They were to have been issued before the end of May but have not yet made their appearance, and in the meanwhile the capital fund is said to be exhausted. The Bureau is guaranteed by the Bank of China, but rumour connects its name with various abuses and alleges that not only was an enormous salary paid to the American employé, but also the officials connected with the institution gave more attention to their own interests than to those of the Bureau.

This incident recalls to mind the admirable services rendered to the Printing Bureau of the Japanese Government by an eminent Italian artist, the late M. Chiossone. There was no question in his case of exorbitant salary nor did any one ever hear of any irregularities in the Bureau with which he was connected.

Certainly accounts differ materially according to their sources. In direct opposition to Tokyo journal telegrams, as referred to above, the German journal of Shanghai has a telegram from Peking saying that Chinese statesmen are much perturbed by the new Convention and that the Prince Regent lays the whole blame upon the shareholders of Tsan Chia-lai, Vice-Minister of the Waiwupu.

The Viceroy at Canton seems to be adopting a very resolute line in the matter of the opium tax. He is said to have emphatically denied that the levying of a supplementary import duty is in any sense a violation of the Chefoo Convention, and, if the telegram be correct, his Excellency indulgences in some sarcasm at Great Britain's expense. He is quoted as saying that all the civilized Powers of the world are lending their assistance to the eradication of the opium vice, and that although Great Britain does not belong to a lower rank of civilization, her coöperation is still waited for.

Saturday, July 16.

It is stated, in connection with the resignation of Sir Walter Hillier, that the Chinese Government has decided not to engage any one in his place as financial adviser.

Hongkong has a rumour that news of a contemplated outbreak on the island of Hainan induced the Canton Authorities to augment the force guarding the island, but the story is contradicted by the officials at Canton.

It is alleged that the Chinese Government was definitely approached on the 13th and 14th inst. by the representatives of the four Powers interested in the Yei-han Railway Loan. These representatives pointed to the agreement concluded by the late Chang Chih-tung, and urged that its terms should be complied with at once. They declared that the best interests of the people in the regions concerned would be consulted by concluding the loan immediately. It is questionable, however, whether the Chinese Government, having consistently sanctioned popular opposition to the loan, will now venture to restore the situation by issuing a decree.

A telegram to the Mainichi Dempo from Mukden says that the first efforts of the Specie Bank to do business in Manchuria under the new system have not been very successful. Only 13 applications for loans have been received, and the total amount asked for is a paltry sum of 110,000 yen. This comparative failure is attributed to the stringency of the Specie Bank's regulations, which impose very difficult conditions on persons seeking accommodation.

Sunday, July 17.

It is alleged that the Viceroy of Manchuria has again made a loan from the Specie Bank. The amount is given at 700,000 yen, the interest at 6½ per cent. and the period at 4 years.

Monday, July 18.

A threatening letter with a knife enclosed is said to have been received by the Prince Regent. It professes to bear the signatures of some of the advocates of the immediate opening of a parliament, but it is believed to be the work of anti-dynastic rebels. Special precautions have been taken to guard the residence of the Prince Regent and of the Ministers of State.

From Shantung comes news that there is considerable disturbance at Haiyang and Laiyang owing to the people's unwillingness to pay the newly levied taxes. The malcontents are said to number 20,000, and although a considerable number of Chinese troops has been despatched to the scene, order has not yet been restored. The Germans also have despatched a battalion from Kinchow to the vicinity of Laiyang, which, being within 100 Chinese li of the German concession, falls within the latter's right of protection.

Tuesday, July 19.

A disturbance on a large scale is reported from Yunnan. The insurgents, who are said to include a considerable anti-dynastic element in their ranks, have for the most part crossed the border from Tonkin, and the French, therefore, are rendering indirect assistance to the local authorities. A large force has been dispatched by the Chinese but there does not appear as yet to have been any collision.

There is no news this morning about the disturbances in Anhui and Shantung, and it may be inferred that nothing serious has occurred there, though previous reports suggested a very disquieting state of affairs.

The long talked-of dredging of the Liao River appears likely to be undertaken soon, but not on a scale at all commensurate with previous plans. The idea at one time was to deal with the river so drastically as to convert it into a really serviceable water-way, thus rendering it a strong competitor of the South Manchuria Railway. But, doubtless owing to want of funds, the programme has never been practically undertaken. Now, however, it is stated that a sum of 500,000 taels it to be devoted to the work, 200,000 of that total being subscribed by the Peking Government and the remainder being obtained by levying tonnage dues upon boats using the waterway and upon vessels frequenting Newchwang. The execution of the work is to be spread over a number of years, and from this fact, as well as the smallness of the appropriation, it may be inferred that nothing of a really radical character is in contemplation.

Mongolia, as our readers have doubtless observed, becomes a topic of rumour periodically. We have heard nothing of it for some time, but now comes a statement from the Mukden correspondent of the Mainichi Dempo to the effect that Russia is preparing to post a whole division of troops at a place 7 or 8 miles north of Kiakta. Probably the story has for basis nothing more solid than a trip of innocent Russian tourists.

Things are not altogether quiet in the region of the Yalu lumber operations. It appears that frequent collisions occur between the Chinese and the Korean raftsmen engaged upon the river, and the Asahi Shimbun alleges that the Chinese Authorities have posted guards at Chian-hsien and supplied them with arms and boats to be used in policing the River. Our contemporary's statement suggests that this force will be employed mainly against the Koreans, but we see no reason to anticipate any such one-sided action.

Wednesday, July 20.

The advocates of opening a parliament immediately in China have not by any means been silenced. It is said that they have decided to get up a monster petition signed by 25 millions of their fellow-countrymen. They expect to achieve this task by the spring of next year, when representatives of the signatories will meet in Peking to present the petition and to urge the claim advanced by it. This programme seems to us somewhat frothy. A colossal organization would be needed to obtain such a multitude of signatures even in the space of 9 years, whereas these agitators propose to achieve their purpose in as many months. Besides, a petition carrying 25 millions of signatures would be of such dimensions as to be exceedingly difficult of transport. That, however, is a minor consideration.

The Minister of Communications Mr. Hsu Hsih-chang, is said to have issued invitations to the representatives of all those concerned in the Yeh-Han and Chuan-Han Railway loans, whether concessionaries, supporters or opponents of recourse to foreign capital. What sort of entertainment, or what kind of réunion, the Minister contemplates we do not gather from the telegram, but the evident purpose of the meeting is to promote some understanding.

The Hochi Shimbun publishes an alarmist telegram with the usual notice against reproduction. The gist of the telegram is that the Chinese Government and Chinese officials generally are much dissatisfied with the action of Japan and Russia in signing an important Convention without any previous reference to the views of the Power whose territory is directly affected. Consulations are being held in Peking, and there is a talk of a strong protest, the view taken being that if the two high contracting parties had entertained any respect whatever for China's opinions, they would have consulted her beforehand. The telegram adds, as might have been expected, that the Americans and the Germans are egging China on in this matter.

It is not unnatural, perhaps, that China should take such a view, but Japan's obvious answer will be that the Convention does not contemplate any change whatever in existing conditions, but provides merely for the preservation of the status quo which has already received China's conventional endorsement. In short, the document is nothing more than an agreement between Russia and Japan that they will strictly adhere to the provisions of the Portsmouth Treaty and the Peking Treaty of 1905, and that they will coöperate to prevent any violation of the terms of those treaties. It does not appear that there existed any valid occasion to consult China before concluding such a convention, and certainly had she been consulted, the fact would have lent itself to much misconception.

There is a rumour that Prince Chun and Admiral Sa will start next month on a tour through America, Germany and Japan. From the fact that Admiral Sa accompanies the Prince, naval affairs may be assumed to be on the tapis, but in that case it is difficult to understand why the tour should not include England.

THE TARIFF QUESTION.

Mr. Sakurai, Chief of the Customs' Bureau in the Finance Department, is quoted by the Shogyo Shimpō as having made an interesting statement. After explaining that whereas the new tariff will go into force from the 14th of July 1911 in the case of nearly all the Powers, the date in France's case is the 3rd of August, and the date in America's case remains unsettled, Mr. Sakurai goes on to say that the complaints formulated by British subjects and others are very natural, seeing that the new conditions will differ from the exceedingly liberal terms enjoyed under the old conventional tariffs. Japan, however, has no choice except to proceed upon the principle of reciprocity (gokei shugi). The difficulty is that her friend and ally, England, being a free trade country, is not able to conform with that policy. The only way out of the dilemma is to negotiate with countries like France and Germany on a reciprocal basis, and then to extend to England, under the most favoured nation clause, whatever concessions are thus secured.

We do not know whether Mr. Sakurai is rightly reported in this instance, or whether he speaks with full authority. But certainly the course he suggests is dictated by justice, not by friendship only. It would be intolerable that England should be differentiated against, because, having freely given everything she has to give, she remains now without any means of purchasing outcry in England about this matter, but in the end, it will be found, every representative Englishman will be content with justice and nothing more or less.

Mr. Sakurai is also quoted as predicting that the new tariff will not bring any substantial increase of revenue next year. It will ultimately add to the State's receipts, but the first year will probably be discounted by imports in advance. Hence, the current year may be expected to see some large imports towards its close.

THE TRAM-CAR ACCIDENT.

The first really serious tram-car accident in Tokyo happened at 8.15 a.m. on the 17th inst. The brake of a car running down the Awoyama slope became useless, and the car crashed at high speed into a stationary car at the foot of the hill. The time being just within discount hours, both cars were crowded, and no less than 30 people were injured, 3 fatally. They were at once transported to the Akasaka Kyoai Byoin and other hospitals, but of course there was some difficulty in finding a sufficiency of surgeons. The services of the Red Cross Hospital were finally requisitioned.

The latest intelligence is that one man, a private soldier, was killed, and 27 persons were injured.

It is stated that investigation shows that a broken brake was not responsible for the accident which occurred on the Tokyo Tramway on Sunday. The fault lay with an inexperienced brake-man, who neglected to arrange the gear properly. Some Tokyo newspapers, wise after the event, say that they had long had misgivings about the state of some of the cars of the Tokyo Railway.

We find that we were wrong in describing this as the first accident of the kind. A similar mishap had already occurred at the foot of the Kudan hill.

It is certainly remarkable that whenever the affairs of the Tokyo Railway come up for discussion, nothing but abuse is poured upon the head of the unfortunate company. It appears to us that Japan is becoming hysterical. The moral condition of the citizens of Tokyo begins to resemble that of Kyoto in the closing days of the Heian epoch. Nothing is more conspicuous by its absence than the calm unruffled spirit of the samurai. The mere fact that an accident occurred a few days ago, and involved the death of one man and the injury of some 30 others, seems to have completely shaken the nerves of Tokyo newspapers, and they write as though the Railway Company were a public malefactor. This is the case with even the leading journals, and sober-minded onlookers ask themselves uneasily what is to be expected in a genuine crisis if a mere petty accident creates so much excitement. We believe that we echo the sentiment of every foreign observer when we say that Tokyo cannot possibly expect to have a thoroughly well-equipped and satisfactory electric railway so long as the citizens refuse to pay a reasonable fare for the use of the cars. At present the city has a service of which it may well be ashamed. Considering the extent of the lines and the size of the population, the number of accidents is extremely small; but, on the other hand, with the exception of the cars of the original "Round the Moat" line, there is not one which can be called clean and comfortable, and as for the crowding of the passengers, it is something shocking. Evidently, there never can be any peace and quiet so far as this question is concerned until the Tokyo Municipality takes over the Railway and sees what it can make of it.

It is said to have been definitely ascertained that the recent collision on the Tokyo Railway was due, not to a defective brake, but to carelessness on the part of the driver, who has accordingly been arraigned before a magistrate.

The newspapers of Tokyo continue their semi-hysterical criticisms. Some of them insist that the driver is merely being made a scapegoat, and that the fault lay really with the mechanism of the car. Unfortunately for the Company, this accident was followed on the 19th inst. by another mishap. Something went wrong at the Fukagawa power-station and the consequence was that the car-service was suspended throughout a large part of the city for nearly two hours, at the very time in the morning when discount tickets are issued and when students and labourers are on their way to work.

CHINESE STUDENTS IN TOKYO.

There was a time some years ago when the number of Chinese youths studying in Tokyo was put at 40,000. We do not believe that it ever reached any such figure or even one half of it. But it is certain that at present the total has fallen to a mere fraction of its original dimensions. One of the principal causes of the diminution is that whereas many of the original students came with the idea of commencing their education in Japan, it was soon discovered that unless a lad had reached the middle-school standard before coming to this country he could not hope to accomplish anything. Then again, the stringent system of regulations enacted by the Education Department produced a deterrent effect, and Western countries, especially America, Germany, and England, attracted many students who would otherwise have come to Japan. The upshot is that at present there are not more than 5,000, who will be reduced to 4,000 after the graduation ceremonies this summer. There are said to be 1,800 officially supported students; and an equal number who pay their expenses, together with about 1,000 whose presence is not officially reported. Of course, the failure of what is called the Sokusei system—that is to say, the system of rapid finishing—has greatly helped to lessen the attractions of education in Japan. It is also stated that some discredit has been incurred by the dishonest conduct of certain private schools which sold diplomas of graduation instead of awarding them after due examination. There are now about 30 students in Army and Navy schools; about 400 in the Meiji University, and an equal number at Waseda.

Mr. DICKINSON, the U.S. Secretary for War, is reported to have left Nagasaki on Wednesday for Manila.

THE CEREMONY OF CONFERRING PRIZES AT THE ANGLO-JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

The ceremony of conferring certificates and rewards to exhibitors at the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition took place on the afternoon of the 10th inst. as already reported by Reuter. We have now a telegraphic report sent by the Japanese manager, Mr. Wada, to the Exhibition Committee in Tokyo. It does not add much to our previous knowledge. The King's message, read by the Duke of Connaught, spoke of the great success achieved by the Exhibition, attributed it largely to the exertions of the officials concerned, and expressed the conviction that an excellent effect will be produced upon the industries and commerce of both countries. The Duke of Connaught, after reading this message, declared that there had hitherto been no instance of a prize-awarding ceremony being held so punctually, and offered his sincere congratulation to all the officials and exhibitors. The number of prizes, certificates etc. etc., conferred on Japanese exhibitors was 2,110, but the exact number is not given in the case of the British exhibitors. Mr. Watanabe, representative of the Mitsui Co., returned thanks on behalf of his countrymen, and a member of the Firm of Messrs Armstrong, Vickers & Co. performed a similar office for the British Exhibitors.

His Excellency the Japanese Ambassador made a brief speech thanking the Duke of Connaught and the British officials for the trouble they had taken in connection with the Exhibition and for the signal success achieved. That evening his Excellency entertained, at a banquet in the Claridge Hotel, more than 100 persons connected with the Exhibition.

More detailed information shows that the number of prizes granted to private exhibitors at the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition was 1,955, and the number granted to public companies and governmental departments was 32.

In the above context, however, we have to place the unsatisfactory fact that the total amount of the goods sold up to the latest date was only £6328: 1: 5½. This is certainly a very paltry showing. If ten times that amount had been sold, it would still have been a poor outcome of such large effort. We do not understand it. No comments appear to have been made, and the only reference to the matter has taken the form of newspaper paragraphs insisting that exhibits which fail to find a market must all be brought home. In other words, there must be no such thing as getting rid of unsold goods at greatly reduced or even nominal prices when the time for closing comes. That would not only seriously impair Japan's credit, but also be most unfair to those that have hitherto made purchases. But our contemporaries do not indicate how this very praiseworthy policy is to be carried out. There is no power that can compel an owner to refrain from getting rid of his property if he sees his account in so doing.

The Yorodzu Choho writes in a most pessimistic strain about the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition. It quotes an alleged report said to have been sent to the Department of Education by an official in London. The gist of this document is that in every respect the enterprise has been a failure. Visitors have been few and far between; the exhibits have not appealed to the taste of the British public, and the purchases have been practically nil. We (Japan Mail) regard this description as a great exaggeration, but that the Exhibition has been a success in any large degree there are no indications. Certainly, since the early notices, which were enthusiastic enough, the enterprise may be said to have been damned with faint praise. At the same time we have to remember that a similar absence of applause has been noticeable with regard to the English section of the Exhibition.

THE JAPANESE BUSINESS DELEGATES.

We take the following from the Japan Times :—

At the instance of the six Chambers of Commerce, of Tokyo, Kyoto, Osaka, Yokohama, Nagoya and Kobe, a reception was given to the members of the business deputation who recently returned from China, on the morning of the 19th inst. at the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Nakano, the Chairman of the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce, read an address of welcome representing the six chambers. Mr. Komatsubara, the Minister of Education, gave a speech recognizing the great contribution made by the mission on the commercial relations of Japan and China. Speeches were also made by Mr. Ishii, Vice-Foreign Minister, Mr. Chang, of the Chinese Legation, Baron Shibusawa and Mr. Hoshino, Vice-Chairman of the Chamber. Mr. Kondo, the doyen of the delegates, spoke on the visit of the deputation and the enthusiastic welcome and hospitality they were accorded everywhere they went. Afterwards all present were entertained with an elaborate collation when toasts were proposed by Mr. Nakano for the health of the delegates and guests of the day. Altogether 200 persons were present.

THE FOREIGN MINISTER DINNER.

Yesterday evening Count Komura, Foreign Minister, entertained at his official residence Mr. Kondo and other members of the deputation, inviting also Mr. Komatsubara, Minister of Education, Mr. Oshikawa, Vice-Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, and other Government officials.

Viscount Watanabe, the Minister of the Imperial Household Department, by order, will give a luncheon at noon sharp yesterday at the Shiba palace to the 12 business delegates who recently returned from China. Marquis Katsura, the Premier, Count Komura, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Mr. Komatsubara, the Minister of Education, will also attend the function.

By special order of the Emperor, Viscount Watanabe, Minister of the Imperial Household, entertained at luncheon at the Shiba Detached Palace on the 20th inst. the twelve most distinguished members of the party of business-men who recently visited China. Among those present at the banquet were Marquis Katsura, Count Komura, Mr. Komatsubara and other high officials. The party having visited the Palace Park, repaired to the banquet hall under the guidance of Viscount Watanabe, who towards the close of the banquet explained that the Prime Minister having reported to the Throne the successful character of the visit to China, and the excellent effects produced by it on the relations between the two countries, His Majesty had issued instructions for the present entertainment and had desired that his appreciation of their services be conveyed to the business-men. Mr. Kondo Rempai made a suitable reply, and the party broke up at 2 p.m., each of the tourists having received a silver cup and a silver vase as a memento.

MR. MIZUMACHI.

Saturday, July 16.

Mr. Mizumachi, the Japanese financial agent in London, has just returned to Japan, and is quoted as speaking in a regretful tone about the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition. He describes the Exhibition itself as a success, but he declares that the Japanese who frequent it have not by any means done credit to the reputation of their country. There have been wrestlers, geisha, silk-reeling women and other persons of the artisan class whose habits have not been in accordance with the etiquette usually observed in England. The doings of these people have attracted considerable notice and have been photographed for various newspapers, to the no small humiliation of the better classes of their countrymen.

Mr. Mizumachi also states that, in contrast with the remarkably easy state of the money market in Japan, a condition of tightness prevails in Europe and America. The proximate cause of this is the recent rapid decline in the price of American Railway Stocks, which has affected investors in Paris also, though to a less degree. But the main cause is industrial competition between the United States and Germany, supplemented by the rubber boom in England. The growth of German enterprise is a remarkable feature of the time, especially as it has no speculative element, being all founded on a solid basis. As to the rubber boom in England, it must not be supposed that there is any question of share rights, as is the case on similar occasions in Japan. Mere speculative purchases are not approved or countenanced in England, where the standard of commercial morality is very high. Another point dwelt upon by Mr. Mizumachi is that whereas in England and America money for domestic purposes is obtained entirely at home, in Japan, on the contrary, the Government has access to foreign markets but the pockets of its own subjects are practically closed to it.

Sunday, July 17.

On his way up from Shimonoseki in the train, Mr. Mizumachi emphatically declared that Japan must adhere strictly to her policy of not floating any new loans. Her financial programme has elicited the applause of European experts, and the financiers of the West are quite prepared to welcome any operation for the conversion of her debts, but if she attempts to add to those debts, her credit will at once suffer. As to weight of taxation in Japan, it is not regarded by foreigners as at all excessive, and there is a conviction that it will be reduced as rapidly as circumstances permit. But Mr. Mizumachi speaks in a pessimistic strain about the new tariff. That is bound, he thinks, to encounter inveterate opposition, and Japan will find it very difficult to come to an agreement with any foreign Power upon such lines.

It is reported that Mr. Mizumachi, who has been acting for some time as Japan's financial agent in London, and who is now in Tokyo, has tendered his resignation. The grounds alleged are that the recent conversion operation was not wholly successful, and that Mr. Mizumachi's health does not permit him to remain any longer in London.

JAPANESE EMIGRATION TO SOUTH AMERICA.

On the strength of information furnished by an anonymous traveller who has just returned after a year's investigations in South America, the Fiji Shimpō writes that Mexico appears to be the most favourable part of the continent so far as wages and opportunities of employment are concerned. About 8,000 Japanese have found their way thither in recent years, attracted mainly by the chance of being able to cross the frontier into the United States. But the Japanese Government having adopted extreme precautions against such excursions, the number of emigrants has decreased, and there are not now more than 4,500 who find employment on railways, in mines and in agriculture. They earn from $1\frac{1}{2}$ yen to 3 yen per diem, and they send home considerable sums of money every month.

In Peru there are nearly 6,000 Japanese emigrants, engaged for the most part on sugar plantations, where they do not receive more than 1 yen per day. Moreover, there has been a great disappointment in consequence of failure to carry out promises of growing gum-trees, so that, on the whole, Peru cannot be said to offer a tempting field. With regard to Brazil, there was at one time much talk of coffee planting, and 781 Japanese proceeded thither with their families, but it was found that the climatic conditions in San Pablo were unsuitable, and these people were obliged to move into the provincial districts. There, however, they found lucrative employment, and 900 others proceeded to Brazil a few months ago. In Chile and the Argentine Republic there are very few as yet. This traveller finds great fault with the Government's vexatious interference. He says that the Toyo Kisen Kaisha receives a handsome subsidy to enable it to carry Japanese emigrants, but owing to the irksomeness of official scrutiny such emigration is checked, and the vessels carry mainly Chinese subjects. He speaks also of excellent prospects for cotton-growing in Mexico.

M. BOISSONADE DE FONTARABIE.

A telegram from Paris dated the 12th inst. announces the death of M. Boissonade de Fontarabie at the mature age of 86. M. Boissonade arrived in this country in 1873, and applied himself almost immediately, in his capacity of legal adviser, to the drafting of a new criminal code of Japan. With the exception of the family law, the commercial code and the law of succession the whole of the criminal and civil codes may be said to have been the work of this eminent juriconsult. One of the most memorable incidents of his career in Japan was his open opposition to Marquis Inouye's project for appointing foreign judges to sit under the revised treaties in cases where foreigners were concerned. M. Boissonade's memorandum on this subject was taken up by General Viscount Tani, and resulted in the interruption of the negotiations and the resignation of Marquis Inouye. He himself probably reflected with the greatest satisfaction on the part he acted in hastening the abolition of judicial torture in Japan. He left Tokyo in 1895, the Emperor having conferred on him the second class of the Rising Sun and a pension of 3,000 yen annually. M. Boissonade was a man of the most lovable disposition. He won the respect and affection of all with whom he came in contact, and among the foreign benefactors of Japan, no name stands higher. For many years he suffered from severe asthma; so severe that a recumbent position was almost intolerable. Yet this constant affliction never seemed to affect his cheerfulness or impair his faculties. Japanese newspapers contain warm tributes to his memory.

CHINGHAI BAY.

It will be remembered that the Government asked the Diet last session to vote a sum of money spread over a series of years for the construction and fortification of a naval port in Chinghai Bay. The Diet, however, refused to pledge itself to a continuing expenditure, and voted money for one year only. It is now stated that the project will again be submitted in the approaching session, the total sum asked for being 12 or 13 million yen, and the expenditure spread over a period of ten years.

We alluded in our last issue to the expenditures on account of Chinghai Bay, and we find a further reference to the same subject in the columns of the Asahi Shimbun. Our contemporary does not, however, appear to be very confident about the manner of the Government's procedure; that is to say, whether the next Diet will be asked to vote the required sum in the form of continuing expenditures, or whether the outlay for 1911 will alone be asked for. The total sum to be expended in the first period is put at 8,135,139 yen, and this is divided into the following installments:—

1912	1,087,718
1913	1,143,417
1914	1,159,411
1915	996,273
1916	883,701
1917	739,661
1918	549,574
1919	497,066

CONTROL OF COMPANIES.

It is confidently stated that the Government has decided to make close scrutiny into the affairs of all companies suspected of being conducted on an unsound basis. Those whose transactions are in contravention of the criminal laws will be taken first, and the quest will thereafter be extended to violations of the Civil Code or the Company Law. Whether as an immediate result of this scrutiny or merely as a coincidence, a very evil record is said to have been proved against a concern calling itself the Chugai Kogyo Kaisha. This was established in May of last year with a nominal capital of 500,000 yen, its headquarters being in Osaka. Not so much as one sen of the capital was paid up, yet the Directors represented the whole as having been paid and actually proceeded to float debentures, which of course is illegal except to the amount of actually contributed capital. Moreover, according to Japanese law, at least one fourth of the company's capital must be paid up before it commences its business.

This shadowy concern was in league with an equally unsubstantial bank in Tokyo called the Tozai Ginko, which did not hesitate to endorse the debentures. The Company had also to do with a coal mine called the Toriuchi Tanko in Nagasaki, and the Directors are said to have been guilty of fraudulent practices in the matter of this mine. No arrests have as yet actually been effected, but several are expected shortly.

JINRIKISHAS IN ENGLAND.

We learn that a British firm in the West of England has introduced jinrikishas into that country. These enterprising people have obtained permission for rikshas to ply for hire at Bath, and the Bristol correspondent of a London paper opines that there seems no reason why they should not become fashionable at health and pleasure resorts. The machines are described as "up to date and dainty," whilst "the drivers look cool and smart in khaki uniforms, with white hats and shoes." A commencement has been made in the suburbs of Bristol with six of these man-drawn vehicles, four of which stand for hire on the famous Clifton Downs.

A propos of this innovation, a former resident of this country writes as follows to the Daily Mail:—

Sir,—I learn that a firm has obtained permission to run jinrikishas in Bath.

I spent some years in Japan, and I know that the Government much regretted the introduction and general use of these convenient and delightful little vehicles—a regret caused by the admitted liability of the riksha men to pulmonary complaints.

I venture to question the advisability of the use of these vehicles in this climate, and suggest that the atmospheric conditions here render it suicidal for any man to run one of these carriages in England.

We heartily agree with this correspondent as to the hygienic objections to the calling of the kurumaya, though it may be contended that the climate of Japan is, on the whole, less exacting, for the purpose under discussion, than, say, that of Hongkong or Singapore. Nor, in our opinion, could the climatic conditions in England be said to be worse, from the point of view of this violent form of exercise, than in this country. But the main objection, it seems to us, is to be based on grounds of sentiment and common humanity. It is with something of a shock, and a sense of degradation, that the stranger to the East sees a human being between the shafts, drawing a fellow-man along the public streets, and it is this very proper feeling that should prevent the introduction of these vehicles into an Occidental country and the transformation of a human being into a beast of burden.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

The returns of the foreign trade for the 10 days ended the 20th instant are as follow:—

	Yen.
Exports	13,180,000
Imports	11,908,000
Excess of Exports.....	1,272,000

The figures for the period January 1st to July 20th are:—

	Yen.	Compared with 1909.
Exports	234,589,000	+29,704,000
Imports	262,780,000	+27,965,000
Excess of Imports...	28,191,000

SIR W. G. ARMSTRONG, Whitworth and Co., Ltd., Elswick, have contracted for the construction of a big battleship for Chili.

THE TREATIES.

Those who have read the document published in these columns on the 20th inst. with regard to the notice of the termination of the treaties, are in possession of sufficiently full information about that question. It may be added, however, that, according to the Kokumin Shimbun, no intimation has yet been received from any foreign Power of a desire to negotiate a new conventional tariff. Apparently, all are prepared to accept the terms of the new tariff.

The Fiji Shimpō writes on this subject of the tariff in a very sympathetic strain. The article is too long for verbatim reproduction, but its gist may be easily stated. It is that England has not been sufficiently considered. She has been treated as an outsider instead of being regarded as Japan's ally, to whom the utmost consideration was due. The Fiji takes exception to the statement made by the Minister of Foreign Affairs in the tariff committee of the Diet. It does not deny the truth of what his Excellency said as to England having nothing to give in exchange for tariff concessions, but the Fiji evidently thinks that this would have been better left unsaid, since it must necessarily offend the British statesmen now in power, who are advocates of free-trade, as well as the large section of the British nation who sympathise with that doctrine. As for the attempts that have been made to explain and extenuate Japan's action, the Fiji does not find them either able or convincing. Upon England's attitude must depend to a large extent the success or failure of the new tariff. It is of no use to attempt to differentiate between national sentiment and commercial interests. The two things are indissolubly bound together. England in her treatment of Japan, financially and politically, has shown a degree of disinterested friendship which the Japanese appreciate and will never forget. But have Japanese statesmen reciprocated duly in this matter of the tariff? The Fiji thinks not. It plainly says that there has been a lack of tact and consideration. We cannot very clearly gather what remedy our Tokyo contemporary would apply, but apparently it advocates a perfectly frank statement of Japan's difficulties and embarrassments, an appeal to British sympathy, and possibly a revision of the tariff rates so as to avoid injury to British trade.

THE MONEY MARKET.

Mr. Sonoda Kokichi says, according to the Fiji Shimpō, that so far as banks are concerned things were pretty much in the same condition at the close of the last half year as they were at the close of the second half of the year 1909, which proves that there was considerable activity in the former period, because the second half of every year invariably sees a brisk demand for money. This well-known financier goes on to say that he does not expect anything like an industrial boom for some time. Men would rather lodge their money in the banks at 4 per cent. than invest in enterprises yielding only that amount or a little more. Money, therefore, will have to grow still easier before it finds its way into the field of enterprise. Hydro-electric works are a case in point. This source of power will certainly be required in considerable quantities in the near future, yet people show much hesitation in spending money on its development.

We may mention here that two of the three parties who have hitherto been competing for the control of the Hydro-electric scheme of the Kinugawa have at length decided to unite, and the Toshimitsu section has paid a sum of 30,000 yen, together with 5,000 share rights, to the Otaguro section. The third section under Mr. Yuri has no prospects of a practical character. It is stated that the articles of union were signed on the 15th inst.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Friday, July 15.

On Thursday and Friday the market opened dull, but showed briskness in the afternoon.

Saturday, July 16.

The tone of the market was very dull on Saturday, except in the case of the Tokyo Railway shares, which for some days back, have tended steadily upwards.

Monday, July 18.

Yesterday the bears obtained complete control. A rumour was circulated that a loan of 40 millions for the South Manchuria Railway is to be raised in Japan, and all purchases on the market ceased.

Tuesday, July 19.

The forenoon session was dull yesterday, but some slight improvement took place in the afternoon.

Wednesday, July 20.

Things drifted yesterday to the downward grade. There was no very marked movement, however, but the prevalent feeling was one of weakness.

Thursday, July 21.

In spite of the unexceptional character of the weather—the 21st was the doyo-iri and the thermometer marked 92° F.—and in spite of favourable trade returns, the market was essentially dull. There were virtually no buyers. We append the quotations for Sept. delivery:—

HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER.

Tokyo newspapers are unanimous in stating that it has been practically decided to effect a union between the Kinugawa Hydro-electric Co. and the Anglo-Japanese Oi-gawa Co. Our readers will remember that the latest news about the Kinugawa folks was that two of the three parties holding concessions on the river had agreed to amalgamate, leaving the third out of account, inasmuch as its concession is valueless. The story now takes the form that this union was preliminary to joining hands with the Anglo-Japanese Co., and that pourparlers in that sense have been brought to a successful termination.

Meanwhile the Katsuragawa Company has obtained its charter, and the shareholders have been notified that the first call must be paid up between the 12th and the 15th of August. Rumour says that the Yasuda Bank has promised to finance these shares up to ten yen, and as the face value is 50 yen, shareholders will only have to put up 2½ yen per share in order to fulfil the legal requirement of one-fourth payment.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Very careful experiments are being conducted by the Army Medical Department to determine the origin and the cure or prevention of the disease which greatly disables the Japanese race, namely, kakke. Rice has been fed to monkeys, dogs, barn-door fowls and pigeons, and in every case plain symptoms of kakke were developed after about 15 days. A decoction of bran and alcohol was then administered with excellent results in each instance. These experiments were conclusive so far as they went, but they left unsettled the question whether kakke in animals and kakke in human beings are identical, and whether the same mode of treatment can be applied successfully to each. That vital point remains to be determined, but there is certainly growing up in Japan a strong conviction that bran is a preventive of kakke. The only difficulty is how to take the bran. To be obliged to eat unhulled rice would be intolerable to the Japanese, and it is plain that the man who can invent some method of rendering bran palatable even when taken in small quantities will be a benefactor to his race.

The state of affairs in Tokyo between the old established Gas Co. and the new Chiyoda enterprise does not look particularly favourable to the latter. It has always to be remembered that 30 years of solid experience stand to the credit of the original concern, and that the Chiyoda folks in promising reductions of rates are talking in the air. Parties have appeared who favour a compromise, but the prevailing opinion seems to be that there cannot be any satisfactory compromise until the rivals have actually tested their mutual strength.

We may mention here that negotiations for the purchase of the Yokohama Gas works by the Tokyo Gas Co. are said to be progressing favourably. The price is put at 3 million yen.

We read in Tokyo journals that a company is being formed for the purpose of manufacturing wire rope. The promoters are Messrs. Kimura, Watanabe and Hara, and the capital is 500,000 yen of which 300,000 will be sunk in the works, and the remainder will constitute the working capital.

A New York paper, not very friendly to Mr. Roosevelt, gives the following summary of his Romanes Lecture at Oxford:—

"I am glad to have an opportunity of instructing the frequenters of this ancient seat of learning.

I will do my best in the time at our disposal to teach you something of the biological analogies of history.

As you perhaps understand, a biological analogy is an analogy that is biological. In other words, it combines the qualities of being biological and being analogous, being both at the same time. History is full of such biological analogies. For instance, the Goths and Vandals were brimming with biology—although they didn't know it—and they were more or less analogous.

How many of you are aware that William the Conqueror landed in England in 1066? Probably not one of you, and yet this is an elementary fact that should be known to all students of English history. William the Conqueror was a bully conqueror. He did not lean upon sentimentality, but waded into the Saxons with a spiked club in each hand. William, as you perceive, was biological and analogous. I hold that every nation that feels the cause of civilization to be its own should not shrink from shooting abundance of civilization into any nation that cannot shoot back to any great extent. The Maxim gun is a universal interpreter. Therefore, I say, be as biological and analogous as you can."

For many years there has been a talk of forming in Japan a coal trust or syndicate which would check the injurious competition that now takes place between mine-owners. But hitherto insuperable difficulties have always presented themselves, and not until now does there appear to be any prospect of such a project materializing. Rumour has it that the Mitsubishi, the Mitsui, the Furukawa, the Kajima, the Yasukawa, the Aso, and other mines have joined hands, and that a syndicate is projected on the lines of the Westphalian institution.

The Emperor of Japan has conferred on His Excellency M. Malevetch the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun and Paulownia Imperialism in recognition of His Excellency's services in the matter of the new Russo-Japanese Convention.

Tokyo newspapers state that the Tokyo Railway Co. will apply for an extension of 3 years wherein to complete its network of lines under the charter. It would scarcely be possible to finish the work in that time, and at any rate a further call would be necessary upon the new shares. Rumour has it that the Company will not apply for this extension until about 2 months hence.

We learn that, despite hopes recently held out to the contrary, the Japan Magazine has ceased publication for lack of funds. The scheme by which Baron Shibusawa was to take over the financial conduct of the magazine appears to have fallen through. Miss Kincaid, the Editor-in-chief, has resigned her position and requests us on her behalf to thank all contributors, especially those whose articles, intended for future numbers, can not now be utilized.

A new cotton spinning company is projected under the name of The Great Eastern Electric-Power Spinning Company (Daito Denryoku Boseki Kaisha). The capital is fixed at 3 million yen, and Baron Shibusawa is associated in the capacity of adviser. It is said that all the shares have been taken up by the projectors and that the opening meeting would be held in the early part of August.

The party of Japanese language-students, who started some time ago, under the leadership of Mr. Suzuki Otohei, to travel in Manchuria, have arrived at Nikolaiusk just at the right time. They presented themselves to the Russians as the first tangible outcome of the new Convention, and they are said to be receiving a most hearty welcome at the hands of Russian officials and people alike.

It may be mentioned here that the second party of Asahi Shimbun's round-the-world tourists arrived at Tsuruga on their way home on the 19th inst. This party travelled outward by America and homeward by Siberia, so that it may have said to have made the grand tour.

There are rumours that General Viscount Terauchi is already shadowed by would-be assassins. A suspicious-looking Korean travelled to Yamaguchi by the same train as His Excellency, and several others are reported to be in hiding in the latter town. The strictest precautions have been taken to guard the person of the Resident-General.

Between the 16th and the 18th inst. the Japanese Government was to give notice to the various Powers of the termination of the Treaties one year hence. It has not been found possible, however, to induce the Washington Government to place itself on the same footing with other Western Powers in this matter, and a year's delay is therefore inevitable in the case of the United States.

A certain Mr. Onodera has just returned from Mexico and reports most favourably on the opportunities offering there for Japanese immigrants. He says that out of 4,300 Japanese residents only 400 are engaged in agriculture. These are the worst paid, their wages sometimes falling as low as 1½ yen per day.

Those engaged in mining operations get from 2½ to 6 or 7 yen daily, and are very much esteemed for their constancy to labour. They show no disposition to knock off 2 or 3 days in a week as the natives do. This authority speaks also of considerable commercial opportunities offering in Mexico. He describes the Chinese middleman as an obstacle to the growth of Japanese trade.

There are some signs of the Uraga dock strike being terminated soon. One thousand out of the two thousand workmen have returned to their employment, though they are said to have done so under the threats of a gang-leader, Miyayoshi, who, having received a sum of money from the Directors, purchased 300 sword-canes and menaced anybody with death who refused to resume work. Meanwhile the Directors have held a meeting, and are said to have decided definitely that the demand of the strikers for an increase of wages to the extent of 30 per cent. shall be refused. The police authorities are endeavouring to bring about a compromise.

There have been some very successful experiments in military ballooning at Nasu-hara about 80 miles from Tokyo. General Count Nogi and other distinguished officers were present. A height of 350 metres was attained and the balloon is said to have worked in a thoroughly satisfactory manner.

Mr. Furukawa, Chief of the Bureau of Management of the Central Railway, speaking at a meeting of the Yokohama Economic Society, said that in connection with the quadrupling of the railway track between Tokyo and Yokohama, it is in contemplation to build a branch line from Tsurumi to Namamugi, carrying it thence along the sea-shore via the newly reclaimed foreshore, to the present Yokohama station. The latter will then be converted into a goods-station solely, the passenger traffic being diverted wholly to Western Hiranuma, whence an electric tram would carry passengers right into Yokohama. Strong opposition is encountered by this scheme. The business-men of Yokohama point out that such a deflection of the passenger traffic would not only entail a serious inconvenience, but would also check the development of Yokohama.

It will have been observed that since last year Osaka, Kyoto and Kobe have been the centres of a strong impulse in the direction of electric railways—so strong that it was at one time regarded as a revival of the post-bellum boom. There are already 3 electric lines between Kyoto and Kobe via Osaka and there is, of course, the Government Railway. Only one of the Electric Trams, namely the Han-Shin, can be called a success, the other two having thus far proved failures. Nevertheless, no fewer than 27 new projects have been formed and applications duly made for charters. Tokyo newspapers state that every one of these has been rejected, and, indeed, we do not see what other course was open to the authorities.

Count Okuma having presented to ex-President Roosevelt a copy of the celebrated work "Fifty years of Open Japan," Mr. Roosevelt made the following reply which has kindly been placed at our disposal:—

June 21st, 1910.

MY DEAR COUNT OKUMA:

I look forward with the most genuine interest to reading your two volumes. They carry of course the great attraction that they have been written by one who has played so great a part in building the new Japan. I wish I could see you in person and thank you, and through you the people of Japan, for their great courtesy to my sister and brother-in-law. I only wish I could have been in Japan myself.

With assurances of my warm admiration for you personally, and for your great country,

I am, very faithfully yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Tokyo papers publish intelligence that the Civil Governor in Formosa, Mr. Oshima, has resigned his office, and will return to Tokyo on the 1st of August. Various conjectures are formulated. One is that weak health has necessitated this step, but in other quarters it is confidently stated that Mr. Oshima has forfeited popularity in consequence of his method of dealing with the affairs of the Ling family. Our readers doubtless remember that there was much talk of this Ling complication a few months ago, but apparently rumour had, as usual, been guilty of exaggeration, for the talk was very soon hushed.

A considerable number of Japanese students appear to have been visiting China recently and touring in that country. Thus we read of a party of students from the Okura Commercial School who are said to be on their way back from Nanking and to have reached Shanghai on the 19th inst. The number of this party is not stated. From Hiroshima, also, quite a bevy of scholastic tourists have set out for Nanking. There are 44 from the Normal School; 11 from the Middle School; 5 graduates and 16 teachers and instructors. These are all on their way to the Exhibition and have reached Shanghai.

The Chiksan Gold Mine lies about 50 miles south of Seoul, in the province of Chunchyong, and has been worked for over 2 years by American capitalists. We read in Japanese journals that in the sequel of investigations made by Mr. Anderson since May last, it has been decided to form a combination of Japanese and American capitalists, and Baron Shibusawa has agreed to be one of the number.

The new Chinese representative at the court of Japan, Mr. Wang Ta-hsieh, was to be received in farewell audience by the Prince Regent on the 20th inst. and thereafter, having visited his family, is to leave. Taku for Japan by the Eiko Maru on the 28th inst.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE CONVENTION.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 16.)

THE new Convention which has been the subject of so much conjecture turns out to be a very simple affair indeed. Broadly speaking, a careful reader will construe it as a compact between two Powers which, entertaining some misgiving about the absolute security of their friendly relations, determined to place the matter beyond all peradventure, and so, having carefully considered their points of possible friction, applied themselves to compile a covenant which should remove all elements of danger. When the two States sheathed their swords after the terrible war of 1904-5, they had learned to respect each other and to desire amicable association. But they were not sure of this mutual mood. One had suffered reverses which begot a longing for revenge. The other had made sacrifices which did not appear to have obtained adequate reward. It was conceivable that this sense of defeat which left a great residuum of strength, and this consciousness of achievement which had been incomplete, might at any moment distort some intrinsically petty incident into a reason for renewing the struggle. This was especially possible so long as a daily conflict of material interests existed in Manchuria, and to Manchuria accordingly the two Powers turned with a frank resolve to gather up every grain of loose lying powder. The new Convention is the outcome of their efforts. It converts the East-China Railway and the South-Manchuria Railway from competitors into coöperators. The high contracting parties pledge themselves to improve the lines so that they shall work in true unison, and to link them into one homogeneous service. The Portsmouth Treaty disposed of this matter in a general way only, for practical experience soon showed that something more explicit was needed. The new Convention supplies that something. Such is the main purport of the instrument. Then there is a natural rider: the contracting parties engage to maintain and respect the status quo in Manchuria resulting from treaties, conventions and other arrangements hitherto concluded, whether between Japan and Russia or between either of those Powers and China, copies of all such documents being exchanged. In short, things are placed upon a perfectly frank and unequivocal basis, and are to be kept there by the united strength of Russia and Japan acting in consultation and coöperation. So far as any third Power is concerned, there is no change of any kind. No new feature is introduced. The conventional situation, as it has hitherto existed, is to continue in existence, the principle of the Open Door and Equal Opportunity being as sacred as ever. In all this there is nothing capable of misconstruction; nor anything to which the smallest exception can be taken by outsiders. In fact, the document has direct importance for Japan and Russia only. It concerns other Powers indirectly in so far merely as it constitutes a fresh guarantee for the preservation of peace in Asia. As for the allegation that it is an answer to the neutralization proposals of Mr. SECRETARY KNOX, that fancy is completely disposed of by the fact that negotiations were commenced in St. Petersburg last November; that is to say, months before the KNOX proposals saw the light. It will be agreed, in short, that this new Convention is not by any means as important for the world at large as was the Convention of 1907. The latter placed the relations between the two Powers on a new basis; the former merely gathers up the threads of the Portsmouth Treaty and weaves them into a working pattern. Any State which deems that its interests are impaired by the new Convention must have been counting on a renewal of the struggle between Russia and Japan.

THE EXTREMISTS AND THE CONFERENCE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 18.)

IT is now exactly a month since the first meeting of what may be called the Constitutional Conference took place in the Prime Minister's room in the House of Commons. Despite all asseverations to the contrary—from the stalwarts in both the great historical parties, and, in particular, from the extremist sections of the Government's own supporters—the mere assembling of the Conference is a tribute to that spirit of compromise in which the British Empire, with its congeries of governed and governing States, has been successfully built up. And it is not too much to say that only by a wise application of the same spirit can the present discussion of the great political crisis end in a peaceful and honourable “settlement by consent.” It is useless for Radical extremists to talk of the entire Government programme of revolution, which was embodied in the Parliament Bill, as representing the irreducible minimum of the Ministerialists. It is useless for the Nationalist agitators to lay down the proviso that Home Rule for Ireland must form an integral part of the final settlement. Yet such, in effect, is the attitude assumed by the tyrannous minorities which have so long held the Government in the hollow of their hands. The Conference had but met twice when Sir H. DALZIEL, the leader of the Red Radicals, asked the Prime Minister whether he still adhered to the undertaking given at an earlier period of the session, namely, “that the resolutions adopted by this House limiting the legislative powers of the House of Lords should be introduced into that House without any unnecessary delay, and that, in the event of rejection, advice would be tendered to the Crown with a view to ensuring that a Bill founded upon such resolutions should become law.” In reply to which awkward query, Mr. ASQUITH had to ask his honourable friend to content himself with the assurance that the Government had not lost sight of, and would not lose sight of, “the declared objects of their policy.” The Labour Party, however, who have taken umbrage at the fact that they are not directly represented at the Round Table, have virtually washed their hands of the Conference and all its works. In full conclave, a week after the first sitting, they passed the following resolution of disapproval and detachment:—

That the proposals for a revision of the relationships between the two Houses of Parliament and the maintenance of the supremacy of the House of Commons laid down in the Veto resolutions passed by the House of Commons on the mandate of the people will admit of no modification, and we therefore protest against any assumption of authority by the representatives of the two front benches to go behind the decision of the House of Commons.

It is impossible, of course, to say what the essential provisions of the settlement will be, if any such satisfactory issue be ever reached. It is generally agreed that the deliberations will occupy several months at least, and, failing an official interim statement as to the progress made—which can not reasonably be looked for—the Briton at home, as well as the not less anxious Briton abroad, will have to possess his soul in patience. The deliberations, it will be remembered, while untrammelled by any limitations or conditions, were to be regarded as confidential from first to last. From this circumstance there is no small hope to be gained, and the mutterings of the extremist storm will probably fail of their intended effect so long as the Conference is sitting. Furthermore the composition of the Conference itself suggests the happiest augury. It contains only one rank Extremist, Mr. LLOYD GEORGE, and that fact no doubt is a concession rather to his office than to his personality, for considerations of finance must, of course, enter largely into the work of the Conference. The Celtic Chancellor, moreover, will be confronted across the table by the last Unionist Minister of Finance, Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, who has inherited no small part of his father's redoubtable qualities. The Prime Minister will have as his vis à vis the foremost of living Unionist statesmen, Mr. BALFOUR, a formidable antagonist in any meeting of debate. Two Peers represent the House of Lords, the Earl of CREWE, in the Liberal interest and the Marquis of LANSDOWNE in the Unionist. Lord CAWDOR, former First Lord of the Admiralty, is the seventh member, and Mr. BIRRELL, Chief Secretary for Ireland, represents probably its weakest element. From such a body of men, preponderately moderate, admittedly able, one thing at least may be expected. Freed from the domination of noisy extremists, conscious of responsibility, reasoning as men with men, England can and does expect from these chosen eight, an object-lesson in statesmanship. As the result of their deliberations, we feel sure, some practical and concrete solution of the problem which has provoked the present crisis will be submitted to the country. It is at least as certain that that solution will satisfy neither the Labourites, the Radical extremists, nor the Nationalists. Whether it takes the form of a Limited Veto, relating to finance, and a Reformed Upper House along the lines recommended by Lord Rosebery; or whether it goes further and makes some palpable step towards the Imperialization of the Mother of Parliaments, the ranters of the Cocoa Press, the windy propagators of Socialism, and the puppets of the United Irish League, will, as one man, have none of it. It will then fall to the British people to decide, once and for all, whether the interests of the Kingdom and the Empire are to remain in abeyance in neglect, in peril, for the sake of pettyfogging or mercenary agitators, supported by the enemies of the Empire, or whether the Ship of State is to be steered by men who can see with the patriotic, rather than the parochial, eye. The day which marks the successful close of the Conference will at the same time signalize the doom of the extremist. The Empire is in no state, and the country in no mood, to endure any longer the mischievous tyranny of self-seeking minorities.

EGYPT.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 19.)

THE limelight of the world's attention—and of the English-speaking world, in particular—is turned upon the ancient but unrestful land which not unjustly regards itself as the earliest cradle of human civilization. For this undoubtedly desirable state of affairs—we believe that no better benefit could have descended upon Egypt at this present juncture—the world has to thank the strenuous ex-President of the American Republic. No more effective means of bringing the Egyptian problem, wilfully, under the noses alike of the statesman, the publicist, and the man in the street, could have been devised than Mr. ROOSEVELT's candid and uncompromising speech in the [Guildhall of the metropolis. The ex-President is credited with a philosophy which, to use his own expressive words, may be embodied in the single phrase, "Speak softly and carry a big stick." At the Guildhall, however, Mr. ROOSEVELT, while clearly bearing in mind the second part of his eminently practical creed, appears to have forgotten the preliminary injunction as to the manner of speech. For his robust and emphatic statement was as the sound of the tocsin, and not least of all to the land under discussion. The leaders of the Nationalist agitation in Egypt (were it put to them) could not deny the soft impeachment of a desire to advertise themselves—within reason; but they do not desire the streaming rays of a critical and almost universal investigation to be directed upon themselves and their doings, in relation to the present unrest in the Nile Valley. For this reason, aggravated doubtless by their extreme disappointment at receiving unmitigated condemnation from a quarter whence they looked for praise—and from the late head of a free Republic too—Mr. ROOSEVELT's candid advice to England with respect to her responsibilities in Egypt was received in Cairo with howls of mingled resentment and rage. For when all is said and done, the artificially fostered unrest in Egypt has a very slender basis and will scarcely bear a world's examination. Let us for a moment, in a spirit of fair play, look at the matter from the point of view of the Egyptians themselves. That point of view is governed by three conditions which it is impossible to ignore in arriving at a just estimate of the situation. We will say nothing of the undoubtedly considerable influence exerted upon the half-educated Egyptian youth by the methods of the Irish agitators (mainly in America), of the seditious Swadeshi movement in Bengal, and, more recently, those of the Young Turks. But the full consideration of all who are interested in the problem of Egypt must be given to its governing factor—the fanaticism, the corruption and the intolerance which pervade the entire population from the official classes of Cairo down to the fellahin of the Nilean rice-fields. Men of judgment who know the country have come forward to enlighten the ignorance of the English people as to the real conditions prevailing in Egypt. Thus Professor FLINDERS PETRIE, the well-known Egyptologist, writes of the peasantry with whom he has been conversant for a quarter of a century:—

Innocent folks at home say that surely the peasantry must see how much better off they now are, and love us accordingly. Let such complacent people hear how one of the best and most level-headed peasants that I know gloated over the assassination of Boutros. Let them hear how the Moslem schoolboys cheered in school, and how the Christians wept, when the news spread. Let them read now how the religious authorities in Cairo plead that no Moslem can be hanged for killing a Christian. And the upper classes foster the fanaticism of the peasant.

It was not long ago that that one of the principal Nationalist papers described the Copts—who represent, in Egypt, a down-trodden minority of industrious and law-abiding citizens—as "curs who ought to be thankful to their Moslem masters for allowing them to be alive." More recently, the exultation with which the murder of the Coptic Prime Minister, BOUTROS PASHA, was hailed by the Nationalist press, and defended on religious grounds as a righteous deed, speaks loudly and ominously for itself. It is this fanaticism, sedulously fanned by an inflammatory press, which forms the most difficult and dangerous feature of the situation. Once let the torch be set to the religious hatred with which the Moslem regards every "dog of an Infidel," and that bloody outbreak is certain through which the revolutionaries hope to attain their ends. Death to the Christians is a cry by which the Egyptian agitators set much store, for their hope is to make it synonymous with their real aspiration—the extinction of British rule in Egypt.

It is generally agreed that corruption constitutes the most serious impediment to any form of self-government, and it cannot be denied that this evil is as rampant in Egypt to-day as when it led to the rebellion against the rule of TEWFIK PASHA and compelled the intervention of England in the interests of Egypt's creditors. "Ordinary business," says Professor PETRIE, can hardly be transacted without tips to officials, and most extraordinary business can be managed in a judicious way through the same medium." To perpetuate and extend this pernicious system is, of course, to the interest of the official and upper classes, and there is ample evidence that it is extending at a rate which must, one would suppose, bring a blush to the cheek of the responsible Englishman, whether at Cairo or in Downing Street. Nevertheless, with all his fanatic and corrupt proclivities, the sedition-mongering Egyptian—and he is the only one who counts for anything in Egypt to-day—has received at British hands soft treatment in the form of a prolonged course of toleration. But that is precisely what the Egyptian can not understand, much less appreciate. He is by nature intolerant. As the authority whom we have already quoted puts it: "He and you must be the two millstones—one upper, the other under. He cannot relish any parity of powers. He must rule or be ruled." In view of these prevailing conditions, which serve to emphasize the utter unfitness of the Egyptians for self-government, it is no matter for surprise that since the departure of Lord CROMER the situation has gone from bad to worse. A land of peace and security has been turned into a hotbed of sedition. The respect for the long arm of British justice, inspired by the stirring events of 1882, has given place to open contempt. Secret societies and a reptile press control the populace: confidence has gone, fanaticism is in the air, rebellion and ruin loom ahead. Such is the state to which Egypt has come, because England, in her righteous cause, has foolishly leaned on that "most broken of all broken reeds, sentimentality."

II.

CONSIDERED from the British point of view—whether it be that of the official of the Occupying Power, as responsible for the well-being of the country, or that of the resident on the spot, exposed to possible danger—it cannot be claimed that the present situation in the lower Nile Valley loses any of the unsatisfactory features it possesses when viewed in the light of Egyptian aspirations and Egyptian national character. For the official view, one would naturally turn to the Report recently issued by the British Consul-General, Sir ELDON GORST. Any administrator to whose lot it fell to succeed a statesman of the calibre of Lord CROMER, who deservedly ranks among the greatest of England's great proconsuls, would, in virtue of that fact alone, have an exceedingly difficult position to fill. It may be that Sir ELDON GORST is thus the victim of circumstance rather than of his own lack of ability, or it may be that he has his hands tied by a Ministry in Downing Street upon whom has descended (at a most unfortunate time) a fresh installment of the un-Imperial, if not anti-Imperial, spirit of GLADSTONE and CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN. Indeed, Sir EDWARD GREY has specifically stated in the House of Commons, in reply to criticisms directed against the present British Agent in Egypt, that the policy which has recently been pursued in that country—a policy which Mr. ROOSEVELT has, by inference, emphatically condemned—is the policy of the present Liberal Government rather than the policy of Sir ELDON GORST. It is generally known that the experiment of giving the Egyptians an increased share in the administration of their country had been initiated before Lord CROMER's departure, doubtless at the instance of the ASQUITH Government. That experiment, as the special correspondent of The Times shows in a striking series of articles, has proved a dismal failure. The new policy was carried on, he reminds us, under a Liberal Administration at home, with a new British representative on the spot, with less caution than Lord CROMER would have displayed and “without the public guarantee afforded by his great personality that the situation would never be allowed to get out of hand.” Sir ELDON GORST, according to this correspondent, has unnecessarily effaced himself, and has committed the dangerous blunder of allowing it to appear as if the British control had been entirely withdrawn. But what, the onlooker will ask, does the British Agent himself say, in the face of this grave situation? We can not do better than append a few salient passages from his Report, which begins with a reference to that “terrible and futile political crime,” the assassination of the Prime Minister, BOUTROS PASHA, in February last (the italics are ours):—

The murderer had no personal grudge against his victim. . . and in defence of his deed merely repeated the accusations which have, in season and out of season, been alleged against Boutros Pasha, in violent and threatening language, in the columns of the Nationalist Press.

“During 1909 the Press Law, which had been revived in the early part of the year, was applied with real, perhaps too great, moderation.” Two native papers were warned and one was suppressed, the latter having already been suspended under the ordinary law by the native tribunals, and its editor sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. These warnings were not, however, successful in preventing the extreme Nationalist journals from continuing to pour odium and contempt on the authorities, and the Government may perhaps be blamed for not having used more freely the powers which they possessed to put a stop to these abuses.

* * *

Ministers against whom the diatribes of the Nationalist writers were chiefly directed were reluctant to utilise the law to repress personal attacks upon themselves, and they preferred to take up the attitude of treating unfounded and libellous accusations with silent contempt. Sad experience has, however, now shown that this attitude does not suffice in Egypt.”

* * *

“The weak points of the institution [the Legislative Council] at present are that the majority of the members are easily led astray by the more turbulent spirits, and that the chief preoccupation of all of them is to avoid being abused in the native Press for want of patriotism.

* * *

“The greatest obstacle [to the success of British work] at the present time is, perhaps, the general want of confidence in the intentions of the occupying Power which prevails among the unofficial upper and middle classes in this country, and causes every proposal brought forward by the Government to be viewed in a hostile spirit.

In spite of these difficulties the only sound course, in my opinion is to persevere on the lines laid down—namely, that British intervention in the affairs of this country is directed to the sole end of introducing and maintaining good administration and gradually educating and accustoming the Egyptians to carry this on for themselves.”

These statements, taken together and with due regard to their source and the official moderation of the language, constitute not only a proof of the gravity of the situation, but a confession of the absolute failure of the “experiment” in the direction of self-government for Egypt. It is difficult to understand how, in the face of that failure and the dangerous possibilities arising therefrom, the virtual ruler of the country can recommend “perseverance on the lines laid down.” In other words, a policy that has broken down is to be persisted in! Is it any wonder that there has arisen “a general want of confidence in the intentions of the Occupying Power,” and that that want of confidence is likely to be reflected throughout the Empire?

Meanwhile the foreign resident in Egypt has begun to speak, de profundis as it were. Over the signature of “A thirty years' Resident in Egypt” one such Briton in exile sends to a London review an account of the situation which can not be called reassuring. This correspondent draws a parallel between the conditions immediately preceding the outbreak of 1882 and those of the present time:—

Then, as now, the cry was raised of “Egypt for the Egyptians,” although there was at that time no foreign occupation to furnish a tangible excuse for disaffection. Then, as now, there was a so-called Nationalist Party, advertised by an inflammatory native Press which had no other raison d'être but the stirring up of strife. There was the same talk of secret societies, of agitators preaching sedition in the bazaars, of the disloyalty of the army, of the distribution of arms among the people, of European hustled and insulted, of insubordination among native employés, of insolence on the part of native servants. There was the same apathy in high quarters, the same disinclination to heed the signs of the times or to hearken to the sounds of warning that grew ever more insistent. The same rebuke was meted out to those who called attention to the danger: that to give importance to the movement was to stimulate its growth. There was the same incredulity as to the ability of the submissive, peace-loving Egyptians to rouse themselves to the pitch of rebellion. Then, as now, the instigators of revolt received the sympathy and support of certain Englishmen who, after a brief visit to the country, assumed that they were better judges of the Egyptian question than those who were devoting a lifetime to its solution.

The Oriental, this authority remarks somewhat sardonically, is said to be incapable of understanding the high magnanimity and tolerance which characterize the Liberal policy; but he is at all events very quick to take advantage of its weakness.” And there is, we fear, no doubt of that weakness. The British military forces in Egypt resemble those in India, in that they are intended in reality to serve as police, so great is the disparity between their numbers and those of the population they are expected to protect. Moreover, except in the two principal cities, the thousands of Europeans and Copts for whose safety the British Government is responsible are protected only by native troops, and there are many cases where Europeans and their families, in the remoter districts, are totally unprotected and (if the worst came to the worst) beyond the reach of help. “We in Egypt,” says the resident whom we have already quoted, “believe that a rebellion is by no means beyond the bounds of possibility . . . that the natives, incited by religious fanaticism, and misled by the weakness of the existing régime, may be induced before long to resort to violence.” But apart from the demands of British prestige, and the peril of our countrymen in the midst of this unrest, apart from the grievous débâcle that seems likely to overtake the great and good work of a generation, there is another reason why British rule in Egypt should reveal an immediate change from foolish sentimentality to righteous strength. Egypt was rescued from barbarism at the cost of British blood and treasure. There are bones of British soldiers, from GORDON downwards, whitening on the deserts which flank “the life of Egypt.” And we fancy that when Britons, in England or the world over, reflect upon these things, they will see to it that a false and misplaced sentiment on the part of the responsible statesmen will not be allowed to nullify the great work that has been done at so great cost. It is high time for weakness to be put away, and for a strong man to take up the work of the strong men who have gone before.

THE ARCHITECTURAL PUBLICIST.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 21.)

THE architectural publicist is a phenomenon of the 20th century. He is the man who, on one or two foundation-stones, builds an illimitable edifice. Always he has some subsidiary materials at hand. They are a thesaurus of resonant phrases. “Time and again examples have been furnished;”

"proofs are too patent to require iteration;" "this is matter of common knowledge not calling for any demonstration;" "the reader need not be wearied with familiar references," and so forth and so on. Such stereotyped forms of speech are the plaster that serves to cover the tenuity of the frame-work. An example is furnished by an essay in the June number of a magazine which ought to be authoritative as to Japanese affairs, seeing that its editor is the well known writer of "The Real Japan;" Sir HENRY NORMAN. The gist of the article is that England erred in choosing the provisions of her alliance with Japan: she should have stipulated for Japanese coöperation, not in military matters, but in the material development of China. "In return for her guarantee of peace to Japan," says the essayist, "she could have secured Japanese support for all the undertakings of her subjects in China. * * * But since England preferred to take the Japanese fighting power as her share in the bargaining instead of the Japanese support of her undertakings in China, the situation has developed as in fact it has. It has been a long consistent story of the sacrifice of British to Japanese interests in China. Time and again the British Government has been compelled to withdraw its support of British commercial undertakings competing with Japanese because it would offend the Power that guaranteed India, that held Australia at its mercy and that kept a fleet in the Yellow Sea to do the work which British ships had been relied upon to do before the Treaty." We beg our readers to take note of the italicized portion—italicized by us—of the above quotation. "A long consistent story," "time and again"—these are the impressive dicta suggesting, and intended to suggest, a protracted series of rebuffs suffered by British enterprise at Japan's hands. But when we look further, what evidence do we find? "Instances shall be given," writes the essayist with artistic sententiousness. What are his "instances," and how many? Just two; one of them contorted into a parody of the truth; the other, a gross perversion of facts. The Fakumen Railway and the Chinchow-Aigun Railway—these are the instances. These two solitary instances constitute the "time and again" and "the long consistent story of sacrifice." Such a tiny mouse born of such a mountain in labour would be quaint enough without any adjuncts. But the adjuncts give the finishing touch. Here is the essayist's story of the Fakumen Railway:—

A third treaty, between Japan and China, binds the Chinese not to give facilities for railway construction within forty miles of the South Manchurian Railway, which the war left under Japanese control. The Chinese then desired to build a railway which just came clear of the treaty restrictions. For this British capital was obtained. The Japanese protested, on a wide reading of the spirit of the Treaty, and the British Government supported their protest, against the interests of the British capitalists and the Chinese Government alike.

There was not a word about 40 miles in the Treaty. A definition of distance is exactly what the Treaty was conspicuous for not containing. Had there been such a definition, the proposed road would have been put out of court at once, for instead of being "just clear" of that restriction, it was nowhere distant 40 miles, and at one point it came within 23 miles. That, however, is neither here nor there. The vital point, the point wholly omitted by the essayist, is that Japan did not veto the road. She agreed to its construction provided that a branch was built linking it with the South-Manchuria system. The stipulation did not touch the interests of the British capitalist. The road plus a branch would have offered to him just as favourable an investment as the same road minus a branch. But China declined. Why? Because she intended the road to be a formidable competitor of the South-Manchuria Railway. That project and that alone induced her to ignore the clamant needs of her home provinces and to plan a railway running through a wild undeveloped region on the confines of her Empire. She was bound by Treaty not to build in Manchuria any road parallel to, or injurious to the interests of, the South-Manchuria Railway. The Fakumen road would have been both parallel and injurious, yet Japan consented to its construction provided only that a linking branch was built. China preferred to abandon the project rather than to build the link. Yet Japan is accused of having blocked the enterprise and closed the door to British capital!

The second instance adduced in support of the phrases "time and again" and a "long consistent story of sacrifice" is even more flagrantly erroneous. It is described thus:—

A worse case, however, was to follow. The Chinese Government proposed to run a railway into Mongolia, in no way approaching the South Manchurian line, but built with American money and with British machinery that would have given employment to the British workmen at home. The Japanese protested, proposing terms which would have transferred most of the advantages from British and American to Japanese pockets, and the British Government again supported the Japanese against its own subjects.

It is flagrantly opposed to the truth to say that "the Japanese protested" against the Chinchow-Aigun Railway and that they "proposed terms which would have transferred most of the advantages from British and American to Japanese pockets." The Japanese did nothing of the kind. They did not protest at all. They agreed to the building of the projected line but asked to be admitted to the financing and contracting on equal terms with the Americans and the English. The writer in the World's Work can not possibly intend to affirm that "equal terms" involved the transfer of most of the advantages from British and American to Japanese pockets. His allegations are curiously inaccurate and betray signal ignorance of facts. The truth is that the difficulty about this railway was not created by Japan at all.

Had Japan alone been in question, there would not have been any obstacle to the Chinchow-Aigun Road. Japan agreed. It was Russia that opposed the project. These things are known to the most cursory student of current events. Yet we find complete ignorance of them betrayed by an essayist in the World's Work who, nevertheless, has the courage to pose as an interpreter of the arcana of international relations. The two instances upon which he bases his magniloquent prelude of "time and again" and "a long consistent story of sacrifice" prove to be mere moonshine. What shall we say, then, about his sweeping appreciation of the bearings of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance?

BRITISH NAVAL SUPREMACY.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 22.)

THE maintenance of British naval supremacy was recently the subject of animated debate in the House of Commons. It will be remembered that the estimates submitted by the First Lord of the Admiralty earlier in the year reached the high-water mark in expenditure on naval armaments, the total outlay amounting to over forty and a half millions, an increase of five millions as compared with that of the preceding year. Nearly the whole of this increase occurred under the head of Vote 8, for new construction; and, in moving the adoption of the vote, the PRIME MINISTER, while deploring the increase and regretting that it had been associated with the notion of hostility against a friendly nation, namely, Germany, compared the Government programme, giving England 25 Dreadnoughts in 1913, plus two colonial ones at the other end of the world, to Germany's 21, plus four eventually from Italy and an unknown number from Austria. In making this comparison, Mr. ASQUITH asked if the margin could be called excessive? Every new Dreadnought, he admitted, delayed social reform, but national security was an essential condition of all social reform. The same query will suggest itself to all students of the situation. Is the margin excessive? As this, for the British Empire, is the question of all questions, any authoritative opinion upon the subject must prove of interest. Mr. DILLON, second in command of the Irish Nationalist forces, thinks it is excessive, and, in the debate which followed Mr. ASQUITH's statement, moved the reduction of the vote by £2,000,000. But as Mr. DILLON hopes and believes that ere long he and his colleagues will be "posturing" on College Green, and, in their new-found independence, will be engaged in "raising the wind" for a navy of their own, we may be pardoned for setting his opinion on one side. Then there is Mr. BARNES, the leader of the Labour party. This authority (more concerned at present in the wrecking of the British Constitution than the upbuilding of the Fleet) gives an estimate of the comparative strength of the two principal naval Powers very different from that submitted to the House by his political chief. Mr. ASQUITH's figures of 27 to 21 become, by Mr. BARNES' deft manipulation, 27 to 13. On the other hand, the leader of the Opposition, Mr. BALFOUR, while rejoicing in the defeat of the Irish motion, gave it as his opinion that "there had never been a time when those responsible for the defence of the country were content to go to so narrow a margin of security." That narrowness, of course, is emphasized by the possible developments of naval construction on the Adriatic and at Spezzia.

From these conflicting estimates of the situation it will be a relief to turn to one uncoloured by political sentiment, tried and impartial. We refer to that well-known standard publication, the Naval Annual, edited by the Hon. T. A. BRASSEY, the new issue of which has just reached us. In the chapter on "Comparative strength," written by the Editor, the following figures are given for four of the leading Powers:—

	Britain.	United States.	Germany.	Japan.
Built	9	4	2	1
Building ...	7	4	11	3
	16	8	13	4

As the above figures include battleships only, there must be added the "battleship-cruisers" of the Invincible type, which are also all-big-gun ships. This makes the four totals 22, 8, 17, and 4. To these must further be added the Dreadnoughts ordered or projected, which, being laid down towards the end of this year, may be expected to be completed by the end of 1912, or early in 1913. We thus arrive at the following table:—

	Britain.	United States.	Germany.	Japan.
Battleships (built and building)	16	8	13	4
Battleship-cruisers (do.) ...	6	—	4	—
Projected (either type).	5	2	4	1
Total (all-big-gun ships)	27	10	21	5

Now the figure 16, given above includes two ships, the Lord Nelson and Agamemnon, which most authorities decline to recognize as Dreadnoughts, on account of their mixed armament and inferior speed. Omitting them, the final figure of 27 falls to 25, but it may be permissible to reckon the two battleship-cruisers presented to the Empire by Australia and New Zealand, orders for which have just been placed on the Clyde, though it is understood that these vessels are to be stationed in Australasian waters and would consequently be of little use on an outbreak of war in Europe. Mr. ASQUITH's estimate is therefore correct—allowing for the qualifications we have made above—while Mr. BARNES has arrived at his figures by the simple process of ignoring the vessels that Germany will bring to completion in the course of the next 2½ years, while counting those that Great Britain expects to complete in the same time. The Labour leader thus stands condemned as a political juggler, and for motives too obvious to need exposure. It will be remembered that the Opposition, which has been accused of making exaggerated statements as to the relative weakness of the British Navy, demanded from six to eight Dreadnoughts to be laid down this year. The Government, finally, have laid down five, and its official spokesman, the first Lord of the Admiralty, has expressed his conviction that any less number would be insufficient to give security. The Government has, for the present, done the least it could do without endangering the safety of the Empire: as to the future there is certainly no room for relaxation.

THE BOOKSHELF.

The Unity of the Universe.

THE above is the title of a book of 376 pages recently issued by the Methodist Publishing House, Ginza, Tokyo. The author is the Rev. Joseph Cosand. In the preface he states that the object of the book is to remove the apparent conflict between science and religion by demonstrating the nature of the constitution of matter and the relation of the physical to the spiritual world. The basis for the argument, which he lays down in the beginning, is that nothing invariably comes from nothing, or from vacuity, this being proven by the law of the equality of action and reaction in every physical system. Vacuity, being wholly destitute of either kinetic or potential energy, can neither act nor react. Hence the Chinese philosophy, which makes "Mu"—nothingness—the origin of creation, and the Indian philosophy of "Nirvana"—non-existence—the precosmic principle, are both alike untenable, as is also the western idea that God created matter from nothing. Mr. Cosand then takes up the theory that gravitation is exerted over one body by another across vast distances without the aid of intervening matter and shows it to be absurd. The best scientific thought of the present day seeks the cause of gravitation in a universal medium in space. The only physical medium known to us, which satisfies the condition of universality, is æther. This substance is shown to be atomic, is subject to the laws governing other forms of matter and is the agent of heat, light and electromagnetism. Many references from eminent scientists are quoted to prove the electro-magnetic constitution of all matter, and a number of figures illustrate the nature of electro-magnetic action, showing it to be similar to the motions of the atmosphere in a cyclone. Both the electro-magnetic system and the cyclonic system have polarity. Each has a nucleus of kinetic energy and a field surrounding it of potential energy, whose lines of force move in opposition to the energy of the nucleus. The sun is a great magnet with a magnetic field extending beyond the orbit of Neptune. The earth is a lesser magnet whose field extends beyond the orbit of the moon. The moon is a still smaller magnet having a field of its own. This is known to be so because both the sun and the moon produce electric phenomena on the earth.

If the principles of the electro-magnet and the cyclone be applied to smaller systems, like the molecule and the atom, as the author thinks we are justified in doing, every physical system in the universe has a portion which acts the part of a centre of energy and is the kinetic force of the system, while a larger area which usually envelops the centre is the potential energy of the system. The nuclei of physical systems are more dense than their fields; consequently they radiate heat. The earth, as the centre of its own magnetic system, binds the atmosphere and the æther enveloping it to itself by electro-magnetic action, according to the law of the inverse squares, thus causing a stress in every part of the system. The author shows that radiant heat is a repellent force; that it is radiated from all dense bodies creating waves in the tenuous matter which envelops them; and as the effect of such waves is to draw dense bodies towards the centre of disturbance, he concludes, after considerable experimentation, that gravity is the result of heat radiation, heat being the kinetic outward moving energy, while gravity is the necessary reactionary or potential energy moving towards the centre. Both are subject to the law of the inverse squares and the two constitute a system of energy fulfilling all the requirements of physical laws.

The dual energy of physical systems is shown to be prominent in the cell life of vegetable and animal organisms, especially in germ-cells, there never having been one discovered in which both the nucleus and its envelope were not visible, the former being the living kinetic force while the latter is potential energy, its chief function being to nourish the life germ. Moreover the author finds in the systems of the mineral, the vegetable and the animal kingdoms, a reproductive area of high pressure, or excessive nutrition, which tends to form new systems like the primary or parent system. This he calls the third principle. The principle is always begotten and sustained by the dual energies of each system. In the sun's photosphere it develops sun-spots, and possibly at one time, through its action, the planets were formed. In the earth's meteorological system it develops secondary cyclones which govern the rainfall of the earth. And in vegetable and animal organisms it begets new germ-life.

Carrying the investigations farther it is seen that the inertia of matter; the inability of a magnet to originate and maintain magnetic action without an involution of magnetic energy from without; the inability of nature to evolve new life except from preexisting life, all demonstrate that nature in its entirety is an effect, a potentiality of antecedent energy. Furthermore, as like produces like, we are forced to the conclusion that the energy behind the cosmos is dual energy embracing a third or creative principle of energy, and also that this triune principle of energy is life. Anti-Deistic evolution is thus shown to be inadequate, only evolution which comes of involution being tenable.

The author reasons that as physical systems are constituted of duality which, in a more or less developed form, embraces a third or reproductive principle, we have in nature a triune principle in unity which is a facsimile, an image, of the Christian doctrine of three persons in one God. The central Personality, the Source, is the Father, while the Holy Spirit, in psychological terms, is His objective Personality. Christ, who is of the Father and who is sustained by Him, is the intermediate and creative Personality. Upon this basis it is argued that a creative cycle of energy has gone forth from God, working through successive ages until man is formed, as shown in geology and also in the first chapter of Genesis, both of which bear similar testimony. Man is the terminus, the climax of the physical creation. In him the physical cycle turns back towards its source—Godwards. The first half of the creative cycle is physical, active, kinetic; but the second half, in harmony with the law of the constitution or created systems, is passive, potential, spiritual. This spiritual creation or evolution of man as narrated in the Bible from Gen. 2.4 to Rev. 21 is effected through Christ acting upon man's spiritual nature, who, without Christ, has not spiritual potentiality—power to act in response to spiritual influence from God. Christ is the sociological, moral, and religious world nucleus, the life, while mankind is his potential field.

This remarkable theory, succinctly and scientifically expressed as it is in Mr. Cosand's fascinating work, will doubtless provoke much controversy. But with that we have nothing to do here. The business of a reviewer is to lay before his readers a plain statement of the matter reviewed, so that they may form their own conclusions as to the value of further inquiry by direct reference to the book in question. There can not, we think, be any second opinion as to the claim that Mr. Cosand's work has on every student of truth.

Specimens of Translation; Vol. III., by W. DENING.

MR. W. DENING has compiled another of his excellent works under the above heading. His plan is to take extracts from newspaper articles, magazine essays and philosophical treatises, and to render them into English, printing the two texts in parallel columns. Mr. Dening is eminently fitted for this task. He has a thorough knowledge of the two languages; a knowledge not only of their grammar and their syntax, but also of their idiom. It results that his translations are admirable. They should prove of great service to Japanese students of English and to English students of Japanese. In the case of the latter there is the obstacle of the ideograph, but that can be easily overcome by employing a Japanese to romanize the ideographic text. Nevertheless, it is mainly for Japanese students of English that Mr. Dening writes, and to them his work should be invaluable. Phrase-books are very useful in their way. But they have their limitations. They do not teach how to compose or speak consecutively. That can be best learned from works of the kind produced from Mr. Dening. To extend their sphere of service-ability as widely as possible, they should be treated as high-school readers.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

St. Petersburg, June 28.

Some sensation has been caused in journalistic circles here by the arrest and imprisonment by the political police of a well-known correspondent of various Austrian and German agencies and newspapers, who has also for some years back represented in St. Petersburg one of the sensational London halfpenny papers. The charge is one of espionage in the interests of the Austrian Embassy for whom, it is alleged, the arrested man, a Baron Ungern-Sternberg, acted as unacknowledged intermediary in the purchase of military secrets for Austria. As the suspect is a Russian subject it is likely to go hard with him for spying upon his native country in the interests of the foreigner. The Ungern-Sternberg family is one of the old Baltic Province German noble houses of high distinction, but there are many branches of the family, and hundreds of men in various walks of life bear the title of Baron Ungern-Sternberg. The arrested man was born and bred in Russia and duly served the usual time in a Russian regiment. After that he appears to have led a varied life in many quarters of the world, married in Spain but separated from his wife, and after a period about which nothing appears to be known, reappeared in St. Petersburg in the service of the Austrian Government as representative of the official Austrian news agency. The Austrian military attaché, with whom it is alleged the spy service conducted by Ungern-Sternberg was arranged, is at present absent from St. Petersburg, and will not it is said return to his post. The political police made two domiciliary perquisitions at his residence, seized his correspondence and finally arrested Baron Ungern-Sternberg, who is now confined in the prison attached to the service of the secret police. The sentence following upon such a charge as that of espionage for the foreigner by a Russian subject and ex-officer in the Russian army is a severe one, but efforts are being made by the suspected man's friends to secure the best advice and assistance in the event of the case being tried by a court of law.

The Upper House has concluded the Finnish Bill, which passed by an overwhelming majority in the identical form accepted by the Duma. The Bill will therefore receive the Imperial signature without any delay, probably this week-end at latest. The Duma and the Upper House will meet on Thursday for the last sitting of the session, and will be prorogued till October 28th. This will be the first occasion on which the session in both Houses will terminate officially on the same day. Most of the members of the Duma have already dispersed and the proceedings on Thursday will be of a purely formal nature.

A new aeroplane is much talked of here and will, it is expected, be purchased by the Russian War Office. It is described as an improved Blériot, with the addition of a second pair of wings, above the ordinary, and smaller in spread. The principal improvements however are in the controlling apparatus. While some flying machines like the Wright patterns require both hands and both feet to be kept constantly on the levers, and others, like the Farman patterns, though leaving one hand free, are not easily controlled by either hand, the new form is as simply worked as an ordinary motor. The controlling apparatus is in the form of the familiar motor-car steering gear, a wheel, easily available for either hand and only requiring one hand to work. By an ingenious joint this wheel likewise controls the rising and falling movements, being dipped towards the operator to rise and thrust from him to descend, thus following the motions instinctive to the body in either case. Other levers for assisting the balance are worked by the feet.

Yesterday was the two hundredth anniversary of the taking of Viborg from the Swedes by the forces of Peter the Great, who thereby, in the Emperor's words, secured a "cushion upon which the new capital of St. Petersburg (sic) might safely rest." The day was celebrated by Russians in Finland and marked by an Imperial Rescript which repeats the opening of the famous Manifesto of Alexander the First after taking by force of arms from Sweden the rest of Finland: "By the will of God and the victories of Peter the Great. . . . The glorious successes of the Russian arms in subsequent reigns multiplied the conquests of Peter the Great and the entire territory of Finland at the beginning of last century passed into the property and sovereign possession of the Russian Empire etc."

The world knows little, and indeed Russians in general know not very much, of what those "glorious successes" were. The troops of Alexander the First crossed the sea on the ice in a bitter frost and a blinding snowstorm, surprised the Swedes in their capital and won Finland for the fourth time in history. The Bill just passed so opportunely, on the anniversary of the taking of Viborg, for the first time brings order into the relations between the conquered people, which so far have gone along more or less haphazard for a century past.

The Emperor and Empress, the Tsarevich and other members of the Imperial Family are still at a Baltic Port. On July 17th they will proceed to Riga for the fêtes there on the occasion of the unveiling of yet another monument to Russia's first great reformer, Peter the Great. After the conclusion of these fêtes the Imperial family will proceed to their shooting box in the great forest of Belovesc and probably thence pay a visit to the Empress's brother at Hesse-Darmstadt, returning to St. Petersburg in October.

Count Tolstoy has lately been exhibiting a remarkable activity for one of his patriarchal age. He is reported to have left Tula once more on a three weeks' visit to the country seat of his friend and literary executor Chertkov. Recent visitors to Jasnaja Poljana give excellent accounts of the Count's health: he walks and rides regularly and is busy with further literary work of various kinds.

An amalgamation has been effected between three considerable iron-works of South and East Russia, namely the Donetz-Juriev, the Russian Providence and the Ural-Volga Ironworks. The amalgamation is regarded rather as a measure of self-defence in view of the present state of the metallurgical industry in Russia.

The presence in St. Petersburg of the Japanese assistant Minister of Communications, who travelled over the Great Siberian Railway in the same train with the Russian Assistant Minister of Ways of Communication, has given rise to a number of surmises concerning future Russo-Japanese projects. These are amplified by theories based upon the arrival of an American who is representing the interests of the syndicate which desires to push through the Chinchow-Aigun Railway. I am not in a position to say that the Russian and Japanese Governments have signed any new agreements, but there can be no doubt about their solidarity of views on the questions raised in Manchuria by this unfortunate proposal to build a line at right angles to the Russian line and crossing it. I understand that under no circumstances will Russia allow such a line to be built; it would not merely tap all the commercial resources of the existing Russian line, but it has certain very obvious dangers in a strategic and political sense inherent in it. Japan has equal reason to oppose this line, as projected, and naturally the vigour with which the scheme has been pushed of late can only result in drawing yet closer together the enemies of a few years ago, Japan and Russia, who since the war have managed to settle most of the multitude of minor differences that inevitably crop up after such a conflict.

St. Petersburg, June 30.

The Duma was formally adjourned to-day by Imperial order until October 15/28th, at which date the Upper House will likewise reassemble after its prorogation this evening.

The Russo-British Chamber of Commerce is interesting itself at present especially with the development of the export to England of Russian so-called "small-masters work" (kustarny), the production of villagers in several of the Empire. A commissioner has been sent by the Chamber to Moscow, the centre of the trade to collect information on the subject.

The motor-car combined endurance and speed test race started according to programme and yesterday the cars reached Pskov on their way to Vilna. Three cars failed to reach Pskov owing to mishaps with the motors. The pace set for the day was 25 versts (about 16 miles) per hour. The roads were somewhat heavy on account of a sudden rainfall, the weather in northern Russia at present being warm but extremely unsettled.

A case of cholera has occurred again at Moscow, that of a boy who recently arrived from Rostov-on-Don, where the disease is raging unchecked, being quite beyond the powers of the authorities. The Caucasus and the Crimea have received a rude check by reason of the appalling accounts of cholera in South Russia, and tickets taken already weeks ahead on the trains are being cancelled.

At Uglich have been discovered large quantities of letters left undelivered, the post-office officials having appropriated the stamp on them and then allowed them to accumulate.

The case of the Austrian spy-journalist, the Russian subject Baron Ungen-Sternberg is attracting more and more attention. It is noted that he did not succeed in gaining an entrée to certain St Petersburg Embassies, but is said to have utilised the services of journalistic colleagues in these cases, among them being a correspondent of an English paper. According to the Novoe Vremja this enigmatic Baron was expelled from the Russian army for embezzling funds when in charge of the regimental treasury. In he Spain renounced his religion and became a Roman Catholic. In Algiers he deserted from the foreign Legion, etc. etc. His mistress and her sister (who acted as secretary for the Baron) have been subjected to examination by the authorities but nothing new has come to light. According to latest information the part taken by an English journalist in this miserable story was merely the result of doing an incautious favour for a colleague, who has betrayed him, but it is not expected that action will be taken against any other persons.

OUR BERLIN LETTER.

THE EMPEROR AND HIS OPTIMISTS.
(FROM OUR BERLIN CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin, July 4.

The Emperor William has got the optimists for which he once prayed. Ninety ministers and Imperial secretaries he has dismissed with a portrait or a jewelled order since he began to reign: it shall go hard but he will complete the century within twenty-five years, as indeed was prophesied when Bismarck fell. Two optimists, the "slim Hollweg," as men call him nowadays, and the ancient Zeppelin hold public attention at the moment: a third, Kiderlen-Waechter, comes from Bucharest to step into the shoes of the genial Schoen, perhaps the most honest Foreign Secretary Germany ever had. Zeppelin first ad partes: "The commercial aerial passenger service will commence in April," quoth the veteran, months ago, and caused or permitted an advertisement to appear for a waiter weighing "not more than ten stone" to serve the passengers in the first passenger aerial packet cyleped, Deutschland. In June the vessel was actually ready and made a voyage from Friedrichshaven to Duesseldorf with a very fair wind at a tremendous pace and with no kind of obstacle. The Zeppelinites shouted triumph and the Hamburg-America and Aerial Transport companies of Germany. Ltd., took over the vessel as fit for service. They ran two or three very short trips in the neighbourhood of Duesseldorf, and sent invitations to the press for a trip to take place on a certain day. Then the usual storms of the three "Eismaenner" days arose and put a line through the reckoning. Deutschland slept in her shed. But the journalists arrived and the authorities thought it would hardly look well to be obliged to postpone the trip with the journalists, especially the American journalists, waiting. So the Deutschland rose "overloaded, under-ballasted" for a three hours trip which ended nine hours later in the forest of Teutoburg. Two motors broke down ("oh, dear no. What happened was that the airship had to be lifted on the rudder by the head to rise over a hill and there was not enough petrol in that position to feed the engine," quoth the incurable Optimist. "The vessel was overloaded, the engines collapsed," said the only independent engineer on board). For nine eternal hours the ship struggled against the storm ("we are of opinion that she is not merely a fair-weather ship," said the press-agents to the company) and finally failed to make any headway, being driven smashing through the trees of the Teutoburg. "The damage is comparatively unimportant" said the official agency, so in order to prove it they ripped the ship to pieces and took the fragments back in trucks to Friedrichshaven. When a vessel fails to make headway against a storm they call her engines failures, and have her re-engined or broken up. When a Zeppelin totally fails to combat the first storm she meets they say she is not a fair-weather ship, and describe a complete and hopeless failure as an "unimportant incident." For nine hours some thirty men went in momentary peril of their lives, so the Optimist announces urbi et orbi that the "regular passenger-service will be recommenced in the autumn." Possibly, but unless people have taken leave of their senses . . . without regular passengers.

Frankly, nothing that is lighter than air can possibly be relied upon to control that element. Therefore a regular passenger-service is farcical until the ship can first absolutely control the gas that gives her buoyancy. The Zeppelins cannot. They can not avoid being blown up on a walliwa or dropped like a stone when the escaped gas has made way for the admixture of air through the pores of the ship's skin. The Zeppelins cannot withstand the increased atmospheric pressure at a height of more than about 300 metres without opening their escape-valves. If a walliwa drives her up, as it did the other day, to about 1,000 metres she has to allow gas to escape sufficient to counteract a pressure of about twenty atmospheres. When the ship falls subsequently, she has not sufficient dynamic force in her motors to counteract the loss of gas. It is stated that the dynamic force of the motor-power will compensate a change of altitude up to 300 metres either way. Beyond this, gas or ballast must be thrown out. It follows that existing types of airships cannot be relied upon except under weather conditions which admit of their remaining within at most 300 metres of their starting level. But there is now building a type of airship destined to cover this difficulty, that is to stand a strain of 22 atmospheres without the necessity for allowing gas to escape, or in plain terms a ship which can rise without loss of gas to 1000 metres under her own dynamic lifting power and descend again at will. Of this contrivance I hope to give more details next week. But Zeppelinitis is pure optimism.

Slim Hollweg, professional optimist to His Imperial Majesty! The tall thin man with the slight limp arrived at Kiel railway station in a brown mackintosh of the paternal type and a somewhat rusty bowler. He jested with the chief of the civil cabinet, Herr von Valentini, the executor of Ministers. So he was optimistic although he had just read the result of the Büdingen election with its fresh socialist victory. He spent two days at Kiel removing Rheinbaben from the post of Prussian Finance-Minister and Schoen from the Foreign Office. He replaced them with Dr. Lentz, an entirely unimportant gentleman from Magdeburg, and Kiderlen-Waechter whom Poldorf of Kladderadatsch satirised as "Spadger" and who consequently shot Poldorf through the lung. Optimist again. He really imagined that the public would believe his liberal tendencies just because Dr. Lentz's enemies once accused him of being a National-liberal. The clumsy literary bureau got to work and scattered painful apologies for the appointment of a governmental nonentity, apologies which no-one believed or took the trouble to criticize. There are, as a matter of fact, two parties amongst the comparatively few people who any longer take the trouble to criticize Bethmann-Hollweg's retirements. (One party believes that the chancellor is a very strong man armed with plenipotentiary powers whose gospel is to 'sit here.' The other party believes that the Chancellor is as he looks a 'fainéant' the catpaw of His Imperial Majesty; a weak man playing cricket with a large bat.' It may be that both are measurably right. It is at least possible that Hollweg is a weak man with a strong determination. But it seems clear that he is a man who really believes that the next elections can be rendered less obnoxious 'red' by an effort to split the National-Liberals into governmental and opposition groups. Which spells optimism because it is the National liberal seats which are falling to the socialists anyway! And the German Emperor takes his annual cruise in Northern Waters leaving a hopeless muddle behind him and an incurable Optimist at the head of affairs.

Herr von Kiderlen-Waechter is possibly the only one of these three optimists who is justified in his optimism. He is undoubtedly a skilful diplomat very much of the Bismarckian school with a strong taste for saying exceedingly sharp things at the right moment. He is a gourmand (are not those amazing beer-evenings of his with their somewhat licensed conversation and immense consumption written amongst the chronicles of half the diplomats in Europe?) he is a Holsteinite and neo-Bismarckian: a sabre-rattler and Anglophobe (his pardon, an anglophil on his own terms—like Holstein who said as much to the then British Ambassador—terms Great Britain could not and must not accept). But he believes in himself first, his destiny second and the army third. So his appearance has fluttered the chancelleries of Europe and cancelled without more ado most of the work of reconciliation achieved by Herr von Schoen. The results are expected to make themselves painfully apparent in the near future.

NOTICES OF TERMINATION OF THE TREATIES.

In pursuance of their already settled policy, the Imperial Government sent under date of the 17th of this month notices of the termination of the Treaties and Conventions mentioned hereunder to the respective Contracting Powers concerned:—

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Great Britain;

Supplementary Convention with Great Britain and the Tariff annexed thereto;

Convention with Great Britain respecting the Protection of the Property of Deceased Persons;

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Germany;

Consular Convention with Germany; Supplementary Convention with Germany and the Tariff annexed thereto;

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Italy;

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Belgium;

Consular Convention with Belgium;

Treaty of Friendship and General Intercourse with Spain;

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Portugal;

Treaty of Friendship, Establishment, and Commerce with Switzerland;

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with the Netherlands;

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Denmark;

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Sweden;

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Norway.

All the above-mentioned Treaties and Conventions, with the exception of the Convention with Great Britain respecting the Protection of the Property of Deceased Persons came into force on the 17th July, 1899; and as it is stipulated in them that either Contracting Party shall have the right, at any time after the lapse of six years in the case of the Treaties with Sweden and Norway and eleven years in the case of the others, from the date they took effect, to give notice of its intention to terminate the same, and that at the expiration of twelve months after such notice is given, they shall wholly cease and determine, the Treaties and Conventions above mentioned will, in consequence of the notices above referred to, simultaneously lose effect after the 16th July next year and cease to exist from the 17th. The Convention with Great Britain respecting the Protection of the Property of Deceased Persons was brought into force on the 25th October, 1900; but as its term is the same as the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with that Power and as it is stipulated that it shall expire after twelve months' previous notice, it will cease at the same time as the said Treaty of Commerce and Navigation in consequence of the notice of termination which was sent simultaneously with that respecting the Treaty. The Convention regarding the Commercial Relations with Canada came into force on the 12th July, 1906, and provides that the stipulations of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation and the Supplementary Convention with Great Britain shall be applied to the relations between Japan and Canada. As six months' previous notice of termination is stipulated, it will be sufficient, in order to arrest its operation from the 17th July next year, to give the required notice on the 17th January next. Accordingly upon that date the Imperial Government will give such formal notice, but for convenience they took the present occasion to express also to the British Government their intention to that effect. Again, with regard to the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Sweden and Norway, by the exchange of diplomatic notes with the Imperial Government upon the dissolution of the Union between Sweden and Norway, those two Powers have since then each stood in the position of a separate party to the Treaty, and the notice of termination was therefore sent separately to each.

The protocols and other documents annexed to or dependent upon the above-mentioned Treaties and Conventions, which, by explicit stipulation or from their character, are to remain in force for the same period as such Treaties and Conventions, will also lose effect at the same time as the principal engagements to which they are attached; but those compacts which are not in such dependent position, as, for instance, the Commercial Convention with Great Britain regarding India and the Special Commercial Convention with Spain, will in no way be affected in their validity by the notices in question; and it need hardly be added that the Commercial Treaties and Conventions with the Powers which have not received such notice will remain, as hitherto, in force.

It should be stated that the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with France, the Supplementary Convention with the same Power and the Tariff annexed thereto, and the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Austria, which are of the same tenor as the Treaties and Conventions which have just been the subjects of the notices of termination came into force on the 4th August, 1899, and similar notice as to them cannot be given, according to their respective stipulations, before the 4th August of this year. It is, therefore, the intention of the Imperial Government to wait until that date before sending the notice to those two Powers. Accordingly the Conventional Tariff with France will remain in force up to and including the 3rd August next year, while the Conventional Tariffs with Great Britain and Germany will, in consequence of the notices now given, cease to have effect after the 16th July next year.

As to the various Powers concerning whose Commercial Treaties with this country notices of termination have just been issued, it is the desire of the Imperial Government to open immediately negotiations for the conclusion of new Treaties.

With regard to the date on which notice of termination of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with the United States of America may be given, the views of the two Governments are not wholly in accord, and negotiations are now pending for a satisfactory solution of the question.

A WEEK IN THE ISLAND OF MIYAKO.

[WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL."]

The Island of Miyako lies a hundred and fifty miles south-west of Okinawa. It is the centre of a group of eight islands, making up one of the sub-groups of which the chain of islands known as Loo-Choo is composed. The island has a coast line of about forty miles and, with the smaller islands, affords a home to about 40,000 people. So few foreigners have ever visited it, that their visits are distinct events in the memory of the island's oldest inhabitants, and to have spent a whole week there may be taken to given one a distinction even in this much-travelling age.

To begin with, the island is not easy to reach, even by one living in Okinawa. One hundred and fifty-miles of semi-tropical sea is no great obstacle, and when one hears that two lines of steamers running to Yaeyama and Keelung call regularly at the island, the trip would seem merely a matter of a few hours of pleasure or discomfort according as one is made up. But things are not always what they seem.

The Kinyō Maru, 450 tons, owned and managed by a Loo-Chooan Company, was advertised to leave Naha for Miyako and Yaeyama, on Sunday, May 24, but Sunday passed and Monday without the ship's entering the harbour. Wednesday was the date of a great matsuri in Naha, and though the ship had got in there was nothing doing in the way of unloading her, on that day. On the next, the coolies were recovering from the pleasures of the previous day. On Friday, it was announced she could positively sail, and we got so far as to enquire the price of tickets. The office manifested so much uncertainty in regard to the price of tickets, which they finally decided was eight yen for first-class, that I decided to wait until they could give me a little more definite information. On Saturday morning, a visit to the office was rewarded with a promise that the steamer would surely sail at three, and tickets were bought at 8 00 yen. Scarcely had I left the office before a boy came running to tell me that the ship's sailing had been postponed until three the next day.

That hour saw us on board, bag and baggage, but it saw no signs of the steamer's sailing. Intending passengers and their friends thronged the ships, half a dozen friends to each passenger. In the steamer's little saloon a Naha newspaper man was apparently holding a reception for his friends among the Naha geisha, who came and went all the afternoon. Every few minutes a new set of passengers and seers-off would come on board until there was not even "standing room only" on the decks of our little ship. In the meantime, however, two or three boat-loads of freight had come on board, and at last the whistle blew, the sight-seers began to leave the ship, and the men were ordered to "stand by" to take in the cables, for this ship like all Japanese vessels is navigated in English. But notwithstanding all these preparations, still we waited. Finally, two more boatloads of freight came alongside and when these were stowed away, our whistle blew again, and at six o'clock on Sunday evening we were off for Miyako.

The Kinyō Maru, on which after such long waiting we were now faring forth, proved, unlike her owners and managers, to be steady and dependable. She carried us safely and smoothly over the blue waters, and about twelve the next day we dropped anchor about half a mile off the town of Hirara, the port of Miyako. The coming of the Kinyō Maru had been as long waited for there as we had waited for her going in Naha, and we had not dropped our anchor before we were completely surrounded by a fleet of boats all eagerly clamouring for their share of the freight and passengers going ashore.

Eager as the boatmen had been in coming, they showed no inclination to leave the ship as long as there was a prospect of another passenger. At last their sails were run up, however, and our head was turned towards Hirara. The five wards or villages which make up this town have over 10,000 inhabitants, but there was no inn at which we could find accommodation. I was, however, provided with letters of introduction to the Gensho, or Toshi (島司) Island Governor, as he is called. Through his kindness, a lodging was found for me in a private house, and as I had brought my own bedding and mosquito net, I was able to make myself fairly comfortable on its new and fairly clean tatami. My meals were sent in from a Japanese restaurant.

The Toshi, to whose kindness I was repeatedly indebted during my stay, was a most delightful old gentleman, a Satsuma Samurai of the old school. He had served with distinction in the war of the Restoration, receiving, at its close, a first-class decoration, which he lost ten years later when he went out with Saigo. In this war he was twice wounded and he showed me with pride a crippled finger which still constantly reminds him of it. Escaping with his life, after a long imprisonment at the close of the rebellion, he came to Okinawa, and for more than thirty years has made his home in the islands. His companions and friends, he told me pathetically, were now all dead or scattered, and he considered the islands and not Kagoshima his home. Here most of his life had been spent and he expects to be buried. Like my good friend, his clansman, Baron Narabara, his long residence in the islands does not seem to have affected his health in the least.—another testimonial to the climate,—his figure is more erect and his step lighter and quicker than many of the younger men under him. He showed me his fine collection of shells, and pointed out with pride the trees in the official grounds which he had introduced and planted. His wife was busy reeling cocoons, but stopped her work to be hospitable to me. Simple, frank, kindly people, will young Japan equal them at their age?

The town of Hirara is a very pretty village. Its streets are wide and well paved, and the houses, thatch-roofed but generally in good repair, stand in the midst of large gardens, which are surrounded with low stone walls, built with stone picked from the very gardens they protect, much as the New England farm-walls are. Indeed, stones were so plentiful everywhere that I was reminded of the remark a man from one of the prairie States made as he stood looking at a little rocky farm near Concord, Mass. "Say, fellows, when those granite boulders rot, that will make a fine fertile field!" In every cultivated field I saw in the island, the stones had been gathered into piles or built into fences, but there was no granite here, nothing but coral limestone.

The only exception to the thatched houses were the official buildings, which are all grouped together on one street and make a very pretty appearance. The country offices and the governor's residence, especially, being bowered with trees, presented a very tropical appearance. Parallel with this street of offices, ran another street of shops and small stores, the Broadway of the island. It was constantly thronged with country people buying and selling. Many of them came on horseback and it was a novel sight to one from Japan to see women everywhere fearlessly mounting their little ponies and trotting off alone, riding astride like the women of Hawaii. The older women of Miyako tattoo their hands as the women in Okinawa do, but the design is wholly different. There is a conventional pattern for each hand, but, in addition to that, it is said that the women put in an additional mark for each new pattern of cloth which they weave. Some of the older women, and presumably better weavers, had their arms tattooed pretty well up to the elbow.

On another street parallel to "Broadway," stood the Primary and Grammar School, where over 1300 children were in attendance. The buildings were well kept up and well equipped, and would compare very favourably with any country school in Japan proper. This school had a Japanese principal, but most of the other teachers were Loo-Chooans. During my stay I had an opportunity of attending a session of the Educational Society and of seeing over a hundred of the teachers of the island. When I came in, they were in business Session, and were discussing the question of holding a summer Institute. Their business was carried on with great formality. Each member had his seat and his number, which he called when he wished to speak instead of addressing the chair as we do. The question under discussion seemed a very live one and a great many people wished to express their opinion on it. So eager were some of them that the Island Governor, who presided, had to remind them that they had heard goju nana ban's opinion several times already and that he could not allow him to speak again while any one else wished to speak. The Miyako people are said to be gifted with eloquence and to be fond of discussion, and it seemed so that day. Earnestness for education has been characteristic of them from olden times, when there were many noted Chinese Scholars in the island. Now so highly are their educational advantages appreciated that it is not at all uncommon for farmers to give a hundred yen toward a new school-house, as much in proportion as ten thousand would be in America.

The native aptness for language was illustrated by the readiness with which Japanese was understood. All the children spoke it, as did most of the men and not a few of the women. Indeed, it seemed much more widely used here than in Naha, probably because the language of Miyako differs so widely from that of Okinawa that natives of the two islands not understanding each other, are forced to use Japanese much as a Chinese from Ningpo and one from Tientsin often resort to pidgin English.

Loo-Choo in olden times prided itself on being a country which observed propriety, and Miyako still deserves the name. Curious as I was, I was everywhere treated with the greatest kindness. The children came by the score to get a glimpse of me, but they were never rude. They never followed me on the streets and never called after me, as the Japanese children everywhere do. After I had visited their school and at the principal's request made them a speech, they all considered that they knew me and bowed politely whenever they met me. It gave them great pleasure to teach me the dialect and they took the greatest pains to have me get the accent and tone of the words correctly, for the language seems to have both of these complications in it. They laughed heartily at my mispronunciations, but I could forgive that, for I dare say I was a dull pupil. Before I left, however, I had gathered a few words and phrases which I could use, but I could get but little idea of the grammatical form of the language.

I learned, however, that the honorific is the suffix gama (in Okinawa gwa, Japanese ko.) The honorific suffix ko is rarely or never heard in Tokyo, but it is very common in the north-eastern provinces, where it takes the place of the "O" so common in the Tokyo speech. Thus in Tsugaru, o cha becomes cha ko and we have such forms as ane ko, imoto ko, futen ko etc. In Miyako, the classical woba, changed to uba, seemed to be in common use, instead of the ordinary colloquial uo, as the sign of the objective case. Ga marks interrogation, but it is also indicated by a rising inflection.

A short list of words in the dialects of Okinawa and Miyako with their Japanese and English meanings will give some idea of the difference between the two.

The use of the tones, the inflections and the strongly marked accents with which the language is spoken, make its divergence from the dialect of Okinawa even more marked than this short word-list would indicate. My companion, a Shuri man, found it quite as hard to understand as I did. He, however, had a good ear and would soon have learned it.

My little language teachers no doubt felt themselves well paid for all their pains by the splendid opportunity they thus had of gratifying their curiosity, and the advantage in this respect it gave them over some nine thousand other inhabitants of the town, all equally curious. One old woman, seventy-seven years of age, came from a distant part of the town expressly to see me. When I came out to meet her she bowed very low, almost to the ground, and put her hands together in the Japanese attitude of worship, but while I was wondering whether I was being worshipped for any godlike qualities the old lady might have discovered in me or whether it was to avert any evil influence I might exert, I learned that her act was the genuine Miyako salutation, a modification of the Chinese method of shaking hands with oneself.

How extensive the Chinese influence has been in other respects I had no opportunity of determining. The island is of course nearer China than is Okinawa, but the latter was the capital, where all diplomatic intercourse was held, and to Okinawa the thirty-six missionary families were sent by the Ming Empress. So that unless the original ancestors of the islands were from China, the influence of that nation was probably much less strongly felt than in Okinawa. In regard to their origin, the Miyako islanders claim a separate ancestry from the people of Okinawa, but just what that ancestry was they do not seem to know. In the local office an extensive manuscript collection of history and tradition is preserved, which I have not yet been able to examine carefully. According to this account, in ancient times, a man named Yonaha Seido came to the island, how or whence is not stated. He found it inhabited, but with no organized government. He resolved to become its ruler. Being alone, that was impossible, but whither should he turn for help? He set up his flag and for seven days and nights he implored Divine guidance. At the end of the seven days his flag was found to have fallen toward the northeast. He sailed away in the direction thus pointed out to him, and came to Naha. Here he procured assistance and returned with a band of colonists to become the first ruler of the island.

In the manuscript history of Okinawa it is stated that Miyako and Yaeyama brought their first tribute in 1389, and that previous to that time there had been no communication with those islands. Whether this was Yonaha's visit or not is one of the problems to be determined.

It is only one of many interesting problems. The island would be a veritable happy hunting-ground for the naturalist. Insect life is exceedingly abundant. The shells for which Loo-Choo is famous are mostly found on this sub-group. The coral reefs which everywhere fringe the islands are wonderfully beautiful and interesting. The poisonous snakes, the habu, for which the Loo-Chos are noted, are said to be represented by a single variety, the Trimeresurus elegans, but though I offered a big price for one I could not secure a specimen, and the people insist that there is no such snake. A very large but absolutely harmless snake, known locally as the "awo daisha, Yellow General,"—or "onaja," the Elephe Schmackeri, is very abundant. All that I saw were over 6ft. in length, and one measured 8ft. 2in. Other reptiles are plentiful, and I myself secured several specimens of unreported species. The natural history of the islands has never been thoroughly investigated, and a naturalist who made his base here could profitably spend much more than a week in Miyako.

HENRY B. SCHWARTZ.

THE Doyo, the hottest period of the summer, commenced on the 21st instant,

THE LAYMAN'S MISSIONARY MOVEMENT.

At the Centennial Celebration of the organization of the American Board of Foreign Missions, which took place at Williamstown, Mass., in 1906, there was awakened in the minds of the Christian laymen the conviction that the work of World Evangelization was not being pushed with the energy and the extent that such an important matter demanded.

The result was a meeting of a few earnest and practical business men in the office of William J. Scheffelin of New York City on the 15th of November to inaugurate a movement for the extension and support of the work of foreign missions.

Mr. Scheffelin's connection with it was a guarantee that it would be conducted in a practical and business way; and that whatever was needed would be supplied. He is the head of the largest drug manufactories in the world, and has been the leader in the movement that resulted in the overthrow of the Tammany Ring in the last election.

Associated with Mr. Scheffelin was Mr. Samuel B. Capen of Boston, a successful business man, who was chosen President, and Mr. J. B. Sleman, a banker of Washington, who was elected the Secretary. Both of these men have given much time and attention to this object.

One part of the programme which was there evolved was a visit to the mission fields by representative and practical business men to make a study of the conditions and the need, and make a report of the same. This has been done and in each case at their own personal expense.

From that time on the work has developed to an extent that has been simply marvellous. It has come to include in its scope all evangelical denominations and all parts of the United States as well as Canada and Great Britain.

Strong efforts have been made to include in this movement the work of home evangelization, but those having the matter in charge have steadily persisted in maintaining the plan to limit it to work in non-Christian lands. No doubt this is a wise decision, as the object in view is quite large enough to utilize all the energy and means at command, and any division would tend to dissipate the enthusiasm and energy that are requisite to success.

Up to the present date the work done has been largely that of education and organization. So effectively and generally has this been accomplished that during the past year there have been held in the principal cities of the United States seventy five great conventions, with thousands of subsidiary gatherings; 65,000 men have paid a registration fee to get into a missionary meeting, and the campaign culminated in a great four days Missionary Congress, the first ever held in the United States, which met in Chicago from the 3rd to the 6th of May, and upwards of 4,000 delegates were present. When we consider the purpose of the gathering and the character of the men who composed it it has been truly called "the most remarkable assemblage of the world's history."

Speaking of the great meeting one of the delegates who was present says, "Numbers alone are something of an inspiration. But the spirit is more than figures that run into thousands, and the mere bigness of the crowd was insignificant as compared with its character: men old and young (more of them young) gathered from east and west, from every reputable trade, calling, and profession, an assembly of brains and character which Christendom might be challenged to match.

"The characteristic of all the meetings was unity. The printed programmes gave the title of the speaker, not his church, and the audience neither knew nor apparently cared to know to what communion he belonged. What he heard sounded like the best of the preaching to which each was accustomed; and, to borrow a figure from one of the speakers, 'We all, Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists, Anglicans, heard them in our own denominational tongues wherein we were born, proclaim the unsearchable riches of God.'"

This unity, it was said, was an importation from the foreign field, where missionary boards are working harmoniously in brotherly cooperation, silencing the taunt that we are trying to convert India, Japan or China to fourteen kinds of Christianity; where schools and hospitals are being founded and maintained by denominational teamwork; and where the followers of Jesus are coming to be known by no other name than Christian."

Mr. J. A. Macdonald, Editor of the Toronto Globe, spoke on the subject of "America's World-wide Responsibility," saying that it is greater than that of commercial exploitation; of imposing political or social institutions; of transplanting ecclesiastical systems; the responsibility of bringing a gospel of infinite love; of rising to the realization that the nation which would be the greatest among nations of the world should be the servant of all."

Lord Cecil, the son of the Marquis of Salisbury, who is a minister of the Gospel, "showed that the Orient has recognized the necessity of adopting the civilization of the West as the only hope of national preservation. Japan has already adopted it, and China is awakening to an appreciation of the necessity. Western civilization must be taught to China not by the bayonet, but by the lips that speak the love of God."

Judge Selden D. Spencer, of St. Louis, said in his address, "We can from the mere commercial view-point bring an argument which is unanswerable for foreign missions, for there is no trade-opener in heathen lands like the Gospel. The commercial nation reaps commercially a thousand fold from its investment in foreign missions."

"I like to think of the Layman's Missionary Movement as divine in its origin as well as in its purpose and appeal. The prayer of the church a generation ago was mainly for an open door through which the Gospel could be presented to heathenism. That prayer has been answered. The prayer of the church two score years ago was for men to enter the opening door. Three thousand student volunteers are now on the foreign field and three thousand more are preparing for foreign service."

"There is one minister at home for every 546 people, and one minister of the Gospel in foreign lands for every 275 thousand; $15 is spent at home each year for every one of the twenty millions of Christians, and one cent per year for each one of the billion of non-Christians in heathen lands. These facts bring home with tremendous force to the business and professional men the inadequacy of what is now being done in carrying out Christ's great commission to evangelize the world."

One of the most popular and stirring of all the addresses was by George Sherwood Eddy, fourteen years in India as Secretary of the Y.M.C.A.; going at his own expense and giving to missions one half of his income besides. Reviewing the conditions in Southern Asia he said, "All Asia is awakening. There is great unrest throughout that continent. It is an awakening involving the reaction of Christianity upon the non-Christian religions. While it is true that India presents the most difficult problem for Christianity in Asia, nevertheless that empire is becoming Christianized. During the last decade the population has increased 2½ per cent., while the Protestant Christians increased 63 per cent., more than twenty times as fast as the population."

"The great mass meetings of India are full of encouragement. More than 500,000 persons have been gathered in from the outcasts of India. Fifty million more of this class are waiting at the doors of the Church to-day for us to uplift them. The mass movement, however, is occurring not only among the outcasts but also among the middle class, the great backbone of India, and the higher classes. I saw converted Brahmans, converted Mohammedans, converted outcasts, men from every province of India, meet together to discuss plans and methods of Christian work, and supported by native money. The changeless life of contemplation is giving place to one of activity, to one of self-realization, of progress. There is now a national consciousness, a new patriotism sweeping over the country.

The report continues as follows, "Listening to the missionaries and to those who at home have watched with keenest vision the progress of events, one felt, if he never felt it before, that this our glorious day is mightier in its opportunities than any which has preceded it; that a century of Occidental impact upon the Orient has brought results at last; that the dreamy East is waking to what we do not fully realize; but the shaping of its new life, in a measure at least, is in our hands; and the failure of missionary enterprise to advance strongly and all along the line at such a crisis will be fraught with incalculable loss."

That the practical sympathy and willing sacrifice of America is being roused by the simple, straightforward presentation of actual conditions, is the experience of every city in which a gathering of the Layman's Missionary Movement has been held. Chicago contributed to foreign missions last year the sum of $163,000; this year she has pledged $285,000. Ninety-two churches in connection with the Southern Presbyterian body contributed last year $69,031; this year they have pledged $114,935. Houston, Texas, pledged $28,000 against $7,000 last year.

Another and a most important result is that a new spirit of prayer has been developed. Committees touched by the world wide view of missions have seen their own needs at home and are giving their time and money for home work as never before.

Some years ago when Joseph Cook was in Japan he said to the writer, "God doesn't make half hinges." For some years there has been a great need of more men and more money in order to carry on the work of missions. This need is one half of the hinge, the Layman's Movement is the other.

WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union of Japan is holding its eighteenth annual Convention, July 12-15, at the Friends Girls' School, Mita, Shiba. On the morning of the 12th, fifty-six delegates with their friends assembled for the opening exercises. The morning was devoted to the announcing of committees and the address of the President, Mrs. Kaji Yajima, who despite her 77 years gave a strong speech.

The afternoon was taken up with the officers' reports, also the reports of the World's representatives, Miss Strout and Miss Davis. In the evening came the welcome meeting.

The next day was devoted to conferences, introduction of delegates, reports of departments, and election of officers.

The old officers without exception were re-elected: President, Mrs. Yajima; Vice-President, Mrs. Honda; Recording Secretary, Mrs. Ibuka; Corresponding Secretary, Miss Yokokura; Treasurer, Mrs. Kozaki.

The Young Women's Association entertained the delegates in the evening. The reports show that much has been accomplished during the past year and the meetings are spirited. The programme for the remaining days has some very interesting features, one of which is an all-day business meeting and garden party in Count Okuma's garden, Count Okuma to make an address during the morning. The sessions are all at 30, Koun-machi, Shiba, in the chapel of the school building, with the exception of the garden party, and are open to everybody.

On the morning of the 14th the convention opened with a conference of superintendents of departments, at which time Miss Watanabe of Kobe suggested methods of work for the local superintendents of the Scientific Temperance Department, and other superintendents present gave helpful suggestions for work in their particular branches. The Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union conference, at which Miss Takanaka of the Joshi Gakui presided, followed and showed more and better work accomplished than ever before in the departments of Medal Contest, Flower Mission and Children's Temperance Legions.

The first part of the afternoon was devoted to a Memorial Service in honour of members who had died during the past year, and on this occasion the Honorable Sho Nemoto made one of the addresses. At half-past three came the Children's Rally, presided over by Miss Moriya, National Secretary of the children's work. Between three and four hundred children were gathered together on this occasion and an interesting programme was presented, consisting of a children's temperance medal contest, dialogues, songs and an address by Mr. Kurushima. The champion flag of the Loyal Temperance Legion was presented to the legion in connection with the Wilmina Girls' School for the best work done during the past year. Osaka seemed particularly fortunate at this convention, since the banner for the largest increase in membership and a money prize for the best department work were awarded the union of that city.

The crowning meeting of the convention was held at Count Okuma's home on the following day. The address of the occasion was made by Count Okuma, and he and the Countess both joined the Union, and contributed one hundred yen to the work. As a mark of appreciation the Union made both the Count and Countess life members. In honour of her seventy-seventh birthday, Mrs. Kaji Yajima, national president, was presented with a purse of over one hundred yen.

The sessions of the convention closed with an executive meeting on Saturday morning. Everything considered, this 18th convention was undoubtedly one of the best ever held in Japan.

COLONIAL NURSING ASSOCIATION.

On account of the national mourning, the usual public Annual Meeting of the Colonial Nursing Association was replaced this year by a small General Meeting of the Council, Committee and Subscribers, and was held in the Australian Conference Room of the Imperial Institute, London, on Wednesday, June 15th.

Lord Ampthill, President of the Association, took the Chair, and moved the adoption of the Annual Report, 1910, which was seconded by Mr. Fred Dutton, one of the Trustees of the Association. Lady Piggott and Sir Henry Burdett spoke on the Report, which was subsequently adopted. The election of the Executive Committee was proposed by Sir Charles Bruce, seconded by Sir Henry Burdett, and carried, and the Honorary Officers of the Association were also re-elected.

After votes of thanks had been passed to the Director of the Imperial Institute and to Lord Ampthill for presiding, the proceedings terminated.

It is satisfactory to note from the new Annual Report that the work of the Colonial Nursing Association continues to make steady progress towards realising the ideals of the Founders. Fifty-four new nurses were sent out during the eleven months ended March 31st, 1910, making in all a total of 220 nurses employed abroad in Government and private service during that period.

TANSAN.

We are informed by the proprietor of the Clifford-Wilkinson Tansan Company that, according to a cable from London, Tansan has been awarded the Gold Medal at the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition.

It should be mentioned that Tansan has had to compete with many European waters at the Exhibition, including Apollinaris and Perrier. To win the Gold Medal from these waters speaks very highly for its excellence, particularly in view of the fact that Tansan has a 60 days' voyage against European waters that can reach England in two days. The bottlers of the Japanese product may therefore justly congratulate themselves on their success.

THE "MONGOLIA."

ASHORE AT SHIMIZU.

The P.M. steamer Mongolia, which arrived at the port of Shimizu, Shizuoka prefecture, on the 14th instant from Kobe, took on board 7,275 chests of tea there and left for Yokohama at 3 a.m. the following day. When the vessel was not far from the port, she ran aground on a mudbank. The accident was reported to the shippers at Shizuoka and simultaneously the warship Takao, lying at the port, was asked to render assistance in refloating the stranded vessel, but declined to comply on the ground that she had not received any instructions from the Naval Office. Subsequently the captain made every effort to refloat the vessel unaided, but in vain. In the meantime the Yokohama agents of the P. M. Co. despatched 75 coolies to the scene in order to remove some of the cargo from the Mongolia's hold. The vessel, which is stated to have on board a cargo of over 11,000 tons, was still fast on the mud at 4 p.m. on Saturday, and it is hardly expected to have her refloated before the high tide of the 21st instant. There are 70 first-class passengers on board, of whom about twenty are to disembark at Yokohama. Some of these passengers landed at Shimizu, to leave for the east by train.

In the meantime the scheme for constructing an electric tramway line between Shimbashi and Yokohama will not be abandoned.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SERVICE.)

THE CONVENTION.

TEXT COMMUNICATED TO GERMANY.

London, July 13.

The text of the Russo-Japanese Treaty has been published at St. Petersburg, and it agrees with the particulars forwarded on the 8th inst.

The Russian and Japanese Ambassadors, communicating the Treaty to the German Foreign Office, pointed out that it constituted a further guarantee of peace in the Far East and did not affect the open door principle. The German Foreign Minister replied that he trusted the open door was assured for Germany in her economic efforts.

GERMAN AIRSHIP DISASTER.

Reuter's Cologne correspondent reports that a dirigible fell from a great height at Erbsloeh. Five of the occupants were killed.

CHINA AND TIBET.

London, July 15.

A voluminous blue-book on Tibet has been issued. Its principal feature is the second dispatch from Sir Edward Grey, the Foreign Minister, dated the 8th May, insisting that China must observe her treaties and trade agreements and intimating that Britain is prepared to protest in the interests of Nepal, Sikkim, and Bhutan, and warning China of the inadvisability of increasing her troops in those vicinities.

BRITISH NAVAL ESTIMATES.

THE STRUGGLE FOR NAVAL SUPREMACY.

A shipbuilding vote of £14,000,000 (?), against which Mr. Dillon moved a reduction of £2,000,000, has been introduced into the House. In moving the adoption of the vote, Mr. Asquith, the Premier, said he deplored the increase. He deeply regretted that the increase had been associated with the notion of hostility against a friendly nation, namely, Germany. Nothing was farther from the truth. Britain's relations with Germany have been and are of the most cordial description. He compared the programme giving England 25 Dreadnoughts in 1913, plus two colonial ones at the other end of the world, with Germany's 21, plus four eventually from Italy and an unknown number from Austria. Was the margin excessive? he asked. He recognized that every new Dreadnought delayed social reform, but national security was an essential condition of all social reform.

Later.

Mr. Asquith said that Germany's world-wide interests are increasing everywhere. He honestly believed that the increase of her navy is necessary. The indisputable acceleration of Germany's shipbuilding programme is among the facts justifying England's programme.

Lord Charles Beresford demanded a new Naval Defence Act, a large increase of shipbuilding and a proper War Staff.

Mr. Dillon's motion was rejected by 298 to 70 votes.

The Naval vote was subsequently adopted.

Mr. Balfour said he rejoiced that the worst had not happened, but there had never been a time when those responsible for the defence of the country were content to go to so narrow a margin of security for a single naval rival.

Mr. Barnes, the Labour leader, said that Germany at the end of 1912 would have 13 Dreadnoughts and England would have 27, including the two from the Colonies.

Mr. McKenna, First Lord of the Admiralty, said that the contract for the five Dreadnoughts in the 1910 programme would not be given out in time for completion in 1912. He was convinced that any less vote would be insufficient to give security.

THE TIBETAN QUESTION.

London, July 16.

The Tibetan blue-book published by the Foreign Office says that the Tibetan Ministers repeatedly requested the dispatch of a British officer to inquire into Chinese interference in the administration of the country, and asked that an alliance be formed similar to that between India and Nepal.

London, July 18.

The Report of the Labour Party's Commission for the investigation of the conditions prevailing in Germany, dwells upon the industrial and social discipline and organization, as probably in a large measure the cause of progress. COMPETITION IN ARMAMENTS.

Their Majesties embark on the 21st inst. for a week's inspection of the Navy, including a review of the combined fleets.

Lord Northampton, in announcing to President Fallières the accession of King George, said that the King would never forget the proof of friendship and affection his father had received from the French nation. The Times publishes 72 additional pages, with maps and pictures, dealing with Japanese history, life, art, commerce, and industry. In a leader The Times, after referring to the admiration and respect which the dramatic appearance of Japan among the great nations has kindled everywhere, explains that the principal object of publication is to correct the failure of the West to realize that though Japan has found a successful expression in war, she is chiefly and honourably desirous of winning worldwide recognition in the domain of peace.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT IN IRELAND.

Later.

An excursion train, disconnected from its engine at Roscrea Station in Ireland, ran back five miles and smashed into a passenger train. Over 100 persons were injured.

LUNCHEON TO THE "IKOMA'S" OFFICERS.

THE RAILWAY STRIKE IN CANADA.

A GERMAN ACCUSATION.

The Frankfurter Zeitung accuses England and France of using the purely Asiatic agreement as an instrument against Germany.

THE BRITISH NAVAL ESTIMATES.

INTERESTING PROPOSAL FROM LORD BRASSEY

London, July 15.

Lord Brassey, writing to The Times, recommends occasional displays of the British naval strength throughout the Empire. He recalls the cruise of the American squadron, pointing out that a similar voyage of British warships would be of valuable effect. He suggests that Dreadnoughts should escort the Duke of Connaught to South Africa, extending the cruise to Australia.

The letter, coupled with the overwhelming rejection of the vote to reduce the naval expenditure, provides for a timely expression of the Imperial spirit.

JAPANESE STOCKS.

On the London Stock Exchange Japanese securities are supported. Osaka fives are firm.

MONTENEGRO.

The Montenegrin note, suggesting the elevation of the principality's status to that of a kingdom, has received the approval of the Powers. The proclamation will take place on the occasion of the August Nicholas Jubilee.

THE NEW CONVENTION.

London, July 18.

Berlin.—The North German Gazette is prepared to see in the Russo-Japanese Agreement, as published, a surety for the maintenance of peace in the Far East. The idea that the Agreement is due to English machinations for an anti-German quadruple entente is not taken seriously.

A MISSION TO TURKEY.

Constantinople.—A deputation of Mussulmans from China, Mongolia, and Turkestan has arrived to congratulate the Sultan on his accession and on the establishment of a Constitution.

"THE TIMES" SUPPLEMENT ON JAPAN.

The Times will publish to-morrow a Supplement dealing with the history, life, art and commercial and industrial progress of modern Japan. The Supplement contains special articles by Count Okuma on the Japanese Empire; Count Hayashi on Korea in the past; Baron Kikuchi on Education in Japan; Lord Redesdale on Old Japan, and by The Times' naval and military correspondents on the Japanese navy and army. Articles on Japanese women are contributed by Mesdames Shimoda and Ozaki.

Later.

The Times, in commenting on the Japanese Supplement, says the issue is designed to dispel the impression that Japan is aiming at a purely military reputation. On the contrary, Japan is desirous of winning world-wide recognition in the domain of peace. The journal trusts that the Supplement will foster a closer understanding of the problems and prospects of modern Japan.

ARREST OF INDIAN STUDENT.

Paris.—An Indian student named Sagakar has been extradited to India, when he escaped from a boat at Marseilles and swam ashore. He was arrested by the French police and handed over to the British authorities.

The socialists assert that this action is in contravention of International law, the man having been re-arrested on French soil. The French Government has asked England to stay proceedings pending further enquiry.

THE "IKOMA."

London, July 21.

The officers of the Ikoma have been entertained at luncheon in the Exhibition. Prince Arthur of Connaught, who presided, referred to his visit to Japan four years ago and recalled the honour he had of having Admiral Togo attached to his suite. He concluded by saying that his stay in Japan was the happiest in his memory and he was deeply impressed at the time with Japan's naval efficiency.

Captain Shoji, the Commander of the Ikoma, who was loudly cheered on rising to reply, said that the Ikoma had come to seal the success of the Exhibition.

Ambassador Koto declared that the Japanese regarded Prince Arthur as a friend of Japan.

Prince Tokugawa said that the Exhibition was hailed as a means of developing friendship between the two Allies.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

THE CONVENTION.

From Mr. Consul-General Mizuno, New York, 14th July.

The leading journals one and all discuss the Russo-Japanese Convention.

The New York Herald doubts whether there is not a secret treaty. It declares that the new Convention does not injure America and Germany only; it will also have the effect of making England and America (sic?) Germany and America) conclude a new treaty for the preservation of the open door in Manchuria.

The other influential journals all deny that there is any secret agreement. They place faith in Japanese statesmen's assurances, and argue that the Convention will be beneficial to peace, or, at least, will not injure it.

The Tribune thinks that the Governments of Russia and Japan are wholly at one with regard to the Secretary of State's views, that the Convention removes the unpleasant features of the Far Eastern situation; that it is not opposed to the open door; that it does not impair American interests, and that it guarantees peace. The only thing is that Russian and Japanese economic competition with America will grow keener. That, however, is not a matter of politics. If Mr. Knox's proposals had any effect in causing this Convention, then the results of those proposals have been good.

Further, all the newspapers say that since, according to Japanese statesmen, the negotiations for the Convention commenced last November, the Secretary of State's proposals cannot have been the cause.

Altogether the moral effect of the Convention is good.

THE PHILIPPINES.

In consideration of an application from the Chief Commissioner of Customs and the Revenue Commissioner of the Philippines, the Governor has decided that certificates of origin may be dispensed with in the case of articles not exceeding 50 pesos in value, which are bonâ fide products of the Islands and are intended for export to the United States of America.

THE NEW CONVENTION.

The North China Daily News discusses the new Russo-Japanese Convention as follows:—We believe that the Russo-Japanese Convention will be efficacious in preserving the peace of the Far East, and doubtless it will be satisfactory to all countries having economic interests alone in the Far East, for the economic development of the Far East is largely a question of the preservation of peace. Before the Convention was published a portion of the French and Russian Press said that Russia would now be able to confront Austria and Germany in the Near East under the ægis of the document, but if such a theory had not been propounded Germany would have welcomed the Convention even more heartily. Of course we take special note of the fact that this interpretation of the Convention did not emanate from a German source.

Further, a Berlin newspaper reproduced the Japan Times' refutation of the idea that the entente between the four Powers was directed against Germany, adding:—"This notion did not emanate from Germany; it was suggested by Russian officials only. Well-informed Germans treat it as mere idle talk."

JAPANESE AMBASSADOR DECORATED.

Baron Motono, Japanese Ambassador at the Russian Court, has been decorated with the Order of Alexander Nevsky.

VISCOUNT TERAUCHI.

At 8 a.m. on the 21st instant, Viscount Terauchi, Resident-General, embarked on H.I.M.S. Yakumo, and, escorted by the Yodo, left Shimonoseki. The party is expected to reach Chemulpo at 10 a.m. on the 23rd.

(RECEIVED AT THE NAVAL DEPARTMENT.)

THE S.S. "MONGOLIA."

On the 15th instant H.I.J.M. Takao received an application to drag off the S.S. Mongolia, which had run on a rock in the offing of Kiyomi-dera in Shimizu Harbour. But as it would have been impossible for a small vessel like the Takao to tow off such a big steamer, and as the Takao would merely have injured herself in the attempt, the application was refused. It was proposed, however, to send an officer for the purpose of rendering any other feasible assistance. No reply to this offer was received, and by 10 p.m. on the 17th the Mongolia, having discharged her heavy cargo, floated off and set out for Yokohama.

("DEUTSCHE JAPAN-POST" SERVICE TO THE "JAPAN HERALD.")

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE CONVENTION.

Berlin, July 13.

The Ambassadors of Russia and Japan have presented simultaneously the text of the new Convention at the German Foreign Office at Wilhelmstrasse in Berlin, stating that the Convention represents only a further extension of the stipulation of the Convention of the year 1907 and is a new guarantee of the maintenance of peace in the Far East. The principle of the "open door and equal rights for all" in Manchuria is not injured by the new Convention.

Herr von Schoen, the German Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, received with expression of thanks the new Convention, saying that he expected the "open door" policy to be maintained in the future. The Russian Government at St. Petersburg, in a further interpretation of the Convention, states that it is not directed against China or any other third Power.

The German press generally receives the Convention very calmly, recognising its great advantage for Japan and regarding it as a further pledge of the peace in the Far East. It, however, regrets the diminution of its peaceful effects by French and Russian papers, which announce that Russia, by the new Convention, will be enabled to counteract German and Austrian efforts and policy in the Near East.

MR. DICKINSON, the U.S. Secretary of War, with Mrs. Dickinson and suite, arrived at Kobe on Monday evening from Kyoto. The distinguished visitors were received by Governor Hattori and other high officials of the local Government at Sannomiya Station. After taking dinner at the Oriental Palace Hotel, the party left the port for Manila.

It is reported from Omiya that on the afternoon of the 13th the sky suddenly grew dark, and shortly afterwards a thunderstorm set in with heavy rain. A severe cold snap followed. When the downpour had ceased, Fujisan was seen to be covered with snow above the ninth station. The mountain is said to have presented a grand spectacle.

ALTHOUGH it is difficult to obtain exact statistics of Japanese emigrants in foreign countries, their number is roughly stated to be as follows:—

United States	70,000
Hawaii	70,000
Peru	5,500
Canada	4,000
Mexico	3,000
Belgium	1,700
Philippines	1,000

ARTEMIO RICARTE VIBORA, ex general of the revolution, one of the most noteworthy characters of the Philippine revolt of 1896 against Spain and that of 1899-1900 against the United States, has been released from Bilibid by order of Justice Trent and deported to Hongkong, he having refused to take the oath of allegiance to the United States Government in the islands. Ricarte, says the S. C. Morning Post, was released as a result of the habeas corpus proceedings instituted by his friends, but contrary to their expectations he refused to swear allegiance to the authorities. He left Manila on June 8 on the Tean for Hongkong.

THE prospective admission of Arizona and New Mexico to the fraternity of the United States will raise the number of States to 48, a figure round and comfortable, says the Observer, though tending towards overcrowding when represented in stars and stripes on a flag. Fortunately for the heralds (or whatever the officials are called who distribute the emblems on the national escutcheon) the process of absorption is now nearly complete—at least till the States start on the task of swallowing South America by the slow but effective procedure of the boa-constrictor. The only 'territories' now remaining outside the Union are Alaska and Hawaii.

CECIL RHODES's dream, the Cape to Cairo railway, is coming true. By the end of the year the whole extent of the line will have been surveyed. From Khartum in the north and from Broken Hill in the south the line is creeping forward to the fulfillment of one of the greatest enterprises of modern times. The line, with its 5,600 miles of steel, will be by far the longest in the world. Boats on the Congo River will carry passengers from Kindu north to Ponthierville. The line from Ponthierville to Stanleyville is in operation, and the next section north to Mahagi is already surveyed. Boat and rail complete the route northward to Lado and Khartum, whence the journey to Cairo can be made by the existing railway. The great bulk of the line, including some thousands of miles at the northern and southern ends, will be British, and the remainder will pass through Belgian territory.

ACCORDING to investigations made by the Finance Department, the amount of Japanese coins in circulation at the end of June represented an increase of 32,628,009 yen as compared with May. The following figures show the particulars:—

	Yen.
Gold coins	30,199,548
Silver and copper coins	131,667,750
Convertible bank-notes	337,230,731

CECIL RHODES still lives in the memory of South Africa. Lord de Villiers, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of South Africa, unveiled on the 28th ult. the statue of the great Imperialist which has been erected by public subscription. He pronounced an eloquent panegyric upon Rhodes, saying that Rhodes foresaw and strove to attain the Union of South Africa. He never forgot his great duties to the land of his adoption, and he admired the Dutch, Dutch South Africans, therefore, would not withhold tributes to his memory merely because they could not approve every act in his career. Friends and foes alike must confess that of Cecil Rhodes it might well be said, "He was a man, take him for all in all, we shall not look upon his like again."

THE Board of Trade inquiry into the loss of the steamship Cadoxton, which was kept afloat for several days in the Bay of Biscay by her crew baling with buckets, and was then abandoned, was concluded at Cardiff. The Court considered that when the vessel left Cardiff her value was £6,000. She was insured as follows: Hull and machinery, £12,000; freight, £1,000—a total of £14,000. The Court blamed the captain and chief engineer for not taking proper steps to ascertain how and from where the water came into the vessel, and for not using hand pumps instead of baling; also that there was evidence that neither master nor engineer had any pecuniary interest in the Cadoxton, and that there was no evidence that either knew that the vessel was more valuable to her owners when foundered than when afloat. The cause of her loss was a mystery.

A REMARKABLE story of unappreciated luck comes from Batavia, reports the Hongkong Daily Press. On June 13, some children found on the roadside a small parcel wrapped in a handkerchief. They played at football with the bundle until the fastening gave way and disclosed a pile of curiously coloured and printed papers. The children played with the papers, tore some of them into bits, and flung the fragments to the winds. The balance they cut up with scissors. On their getting tired of it, the litter was swept up and thrown away as rubbish. Some passers-by picked up a few pieces and found them to be fragments of banknotes. It seems impossible to piece the notes together, but enough of the fragments were identified to show that the total value must be about 2,000 guilders. The Bank is the only gainer by this freak of fortune.

COMMENTING on the balance of sea power in the Mediterranean and the command of the Adriatic, a service journal says the position there is disquieting from an indirect point of view, because Italy and Austria-Hungary are entering on a period of naval expansion which must have its effect on the naval situation in the Mediterranean. The Dual Monarchy contemplates the building of four Dreadnoughts; two of these are already in progress, although the orders may not yet have been placed. It is understood that the financial support for the carrying out of this work is found by the Berlin banks—a state of affairs which is too significant to require further comment. Italy is certain to display at least as much energy in naval expansion as her neighbour on the Adriatic, and this development cannot make for complacency as to the British position.

THE Kanegafuchi Spinning Company held a general meeting of its shareholders on Tuesday at the Tokyo Bankers' Club, when the following accounts were adopted:—

Brought forward	764,473
Profits during the term	856,046
Total	1,620,519
Reserve fund	100,000
Bonus	38,000
Dividend (14 per cent. per annum) ...	681,872
Carried forward	800,647

The meeting also resolved upon the presentation of a pair of gold cups and the sum of 3,000 yen to Mr. Asabuki, the ex-Adviser, and Mr. Fujimoto, the ex-Auditor, respectively.

Consumption Can be Cured

AT LA T A REMEDY HAS BEEN FOUND THAT CURES CONSUMPTION

Derk P. Yonkerman, Discoverer of The New Cure for Consumption.

Marvellous as it may seem after centuries of failure, a remedy has been discovered that has cured the Deadly Consumption even in the advanced stages of the disease. No one will longer doubt that Consumption can be cured after reading the proof of hundreds of cases cured by this wonderful discovery—some after change of climate and all other remedies tried had failed, and the cases had been pronounced hopeless of cure. This new remedy has also proved itself effective and speedy in curing Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, and many serious throat and lung troubles. In order that all in need of this wonderful product of Science may know of its efficacy for themselves, a Company has been formed to give this knowledge to the world, and a book on the treatment can be obtained by writing to the Derk P. Yonkerman, Co., Ltd. (Dept., 237), 6, Bouverie Street, London, E.C. Send no money. Simply mention this paper and ask for the free book. It will be sent to you by return of post, carriage paid.

ABSOLUTELY FREE.

Don't wait if you have any of the symptoms of Consumption, if you have Chronic Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, pains in your chest, a cold on your lungs, or any throat or lung trouble. Write to-day for the free book of instructions, and cure yourself before it is too late.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

MR. MINAMI SHINGO has been appointed a soniu Commercial Commissioner.

THE Government authorities are reported to have decided to make Funakawa in Akita prefecture a secondary naval port.

It is stated that an Imperial Prince will be sent to England as His Majesty the Emperor's proxy to attend the coronation of King George in June, 1911.

AN Oita telegram reports that the Furuichi tunnel at Mikoshi, which is being built, collapsed on the 20th inst. owing to the recent rains. Four workmen were killed instantly and three others seriously injured.

NAGOYA's houses on the 30th of June last numbered 88,739 and the population 399,150—males, 209,523; females, 189,627. As compared with the previous year, there are 1,348 more houses, and 14,011 more inhabitants.

AT an extraordinary meeting of the Osaka City Council, it was unanimously decided that Mr. Uyemura, Chief of the Kyushu Administration Office of the Railway Board, should be recommended as Mayor of the City.

MRS. MARY MILLS, of Hatfield Hyde, Hertfordshire, who celebrated her hundredth birthday a few weeks ago, has spent practically her whole life in the parish of Hatfield. She is able to perform all household duties and to sew without the use of spectacles.

THE latest official returns show that the foreign residents of Seoul, other than Japanese, number 2,409, including 2,036 Chinese, 138 Americans, 88 British, 57 French, and 90 Russians. There are nine American, eight British, six French, and five Russian missionaries.

BONILLY, the leader of the insurrection in Cuba, is preparing for an immediate campaign. A general uprising is feared in Cuba and the people are in a nervous condition. The press ridicules Bonilly's pretensions to power and attaches no great importance to the outbreak.

STATISTICS compiled show that during 1909 the various life insurance companies in the United States and Canada paid out £106,500,000. Of this amount £73,400,000 went to beneficiaries of the insured, and £33,200,000 went for dividends, surrender values, and payments of annuities.

THE Naval Department has granted Lieutenant Shirase the free use of the former warship Iwaki (667 tons) for the purpose of his Antarctic exploration. The vessel, which is now lying at Saseho, will shortly be brought to Kobe to undergo necessary alterations and repairs at the Kawasaki Dockyard.

IN the southern part of Texas, U.S.A., oranges are cultivated by Japanese over a large extent of land. A joint stock company has recently been established in the place with a capital of 225,000 dollars, divided into 4,500 shares. The object of the company is to import, prepare, and sell orange graftings and other fruit trees.

THE KOREAN CENSUS returns covering thirteen provinces are now complete. The work was commenced in July last year. According to the new returns the number of houses in Korea is 2,741,438 and the population 12,959,981. As compared with the last return these figures reveal an increase of 408,351 houses and 3,178,310 people.

SIR ELDON GORST, K.C.B., who succeeded Lord Cromer in 1907 as British Agent and Consul-General in Egypt, is the son of Sir John Gorst, and is forty-nine years of age. He married, at the age of forty-two, Miss Evelyn Rudd, daughter of Mr. Charles Rudd, a South African financier. Entering the Diplomatic Service as an Attaché in 1885, he was appointed to Cairo in September, 1886. He served under the Egyptian Government as Adviser to the Ministry of the Interior (1894) and as Financial Adviser (1898), while in 1904 he acted as Assistant Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

THE Government, says one of the authorities concerned, is engaged in the investigation of the income tax revision, with a view to introducing it again to the Diet in the next session. The investigation will, it is said, be finished by the end of this month. According to the new measure, the revenue derived from this source will decrease by some yen 4,500,000.

THE British Admiralty have placed a contract with Messrs. Yarrow & Co., of Glasgow, for two torpedo-boat destroyers of a special type involving many new features. In these vessels the constructors have been allowed to have a perfectly free hand in the design of the machinery, and consequently the trials of these destroyers will be awaited with considerable interest.

ON Tuesday morning the Military Balloon Corps went through a series of experiments with their balloon on the plain of Ishibashi near Utsunomiya, when a thunderstorm arose so suddenly that Major Tokunaga ordered the expert, Mr. Iwamoto, to take proper steps to rip open the gas-bag in order to avoid an explosion. The expert pulled a rope attached to the valve for that purpose, and the balloon was depleted of its gas in half a minute. The balloon alighted safely on the ground.

It is reported from Shizuoka that since the season for the ascent of Fujisan opened on the 20th inst. a great many parties have climbed the mountain. The temperature on the summit on the first day of the open season was 56° Fahr. and on the 2nd 45° Fahr. The weather was cloudy and there was light rain. On the 23rd, 8 foreigners and 294 Japanese ascended, but no one stayed on the summit. On the 24th about 500 reached the summit. Above the 8th station there is still some snow in places.

THE Railway Board has often been involved in payment of compensation for damages due to fire originating in sparks from passing trains. The districts of the North-eastern railway line being dotted with many thatch-roofed houses which too frequently catch fire, the Railway Board has entered into formal communications with various local governments in that part to take precautionary measures against fire. It was decided that in Aomori prefecture twenty houses along the railway line should be rebuilt into those roofed with a fire proof material. One half of the expenses for this improvement will be defrayed by the Railway Board. Ibaraki, Fukushima, and Akita prefectures will follow the example.

THE schemes for the Tokyo City Hall and the Fine Art Gallery proposed by the Tokyo-fu authorities are reported to have been united in the interests of both the parties concerned, so that the construction of one building available for these two purposes is now on foot by the coöperation of the City assembly and the prefectural government. As to the resources of the fund, the city authorities intend to sell 3,000 tsubo of the unoccupied land near the Yurakuza Theatre and the Gonikan Hall, by which means they will obtain some 300,000 yen. On the part of the prefectural authorities, they will sell forests for some 200,000 yen, so that there will be a fund of half a million yen. Hibiya, Mitsubishi-ga hara and Ueno have been suggested for the site, and of these the last mentioned seems to be most favoured.

KOREA.

Friday, July 22.

The telegraph says that extreme precautions are to be adopted on the 23rd inst. when the new Resident-General makes his entry into Seoul. Some of the measures projected are described in more or less detail, but we cannot see that they differ in any respect from what might have been expected in these circumstances. The situation is in the hands of the military, and it is safe to assert that no precaution will be neglected to preserve peace and good order.

The number of students in custody on a charge of stirring up sedition is now twelve. Their ages vary from 17 to 34 or 35, and they are all without fixed occupation. It does not appear, however, that actual affiliation with any political party has been proved against them, but of course the police must have some proofs or these arrests would not have been made.

Statistics compiled by the gendarmes and police up to June of last year showed that the number of dwelling houses in Korea was 2,741,438 and the number of the inhabitants 12,958,181. Compared with a record previously compiled by the same authorities at a date which is not stated, the above figures show an increase of 408,351 in dwelling-houses and of 3,178,310 in population.

Saturday, July 23.

Seoul wires that on the 22nd inst. the ex-Emperor proceeded to the Palace of the reigning Sovereign and held a four-hours' conference with the latter. The visit was called a "summer call," but its duration suggests that the two monarchs engaged in a consultation about pending eventualities in Korea.

No very signal results have been obtained from the examination of the 12 students recently arrested in Seoul on suspicion of conspiracy. They had carefully refrained from communicating with one another by letter, and in the absence of all written testimony it is difficult to interpret their attitudes confidently. The present idea seems to be that they will be subjected to nothing more serious than a measure of police surveillance.

Certain Tokyo newspapers have the courage to utter more or less explicit predictions about the annexation of Korea. They agree in alleging that the time for this consummation has been left to the discretion of the new Resident-General, who will, of course, be guided by circumstances. But these journals think it very unlikely that annexation will be postponed beyond the end of August. The prevalent idea is that the expenses involved will amount to 15 million yen during the first year, and the Hochi Shimbun thinks that this money will be obtained by floating Korean Bonds in the Japanese market after the model of the Formosan Bonds.

Sunday, July 24.

On the morning of the 23rd inst. General Viscount Terauchi landed at Chemulpo. Deluges of rain which had fallen up to the night of the 22nd ceased during the night and the ceremony of debarkation took place in brilliant sunshine. Two Imperial Chamberlains had proceeded to Chemulpo to greet the new Resident-General, and one of them handed to him an Imperial message. It need hardly be said that the utmost precautions were adopted to protect the person of the illustrious official. These signal occasions are only too apt to suggest fanatical acts on the part of political monomaniacs. Everything passed off quietly, however. His Excellency made no delay at Chemulpo, but took the train immediately, arriving in Seoul a few minutes before noon. There, too, police and military guards watched the whole route from the South Gate to the Residency-General. It is stated that the Resident-General will have his first audience at the Palace on the 26th inst.

There has been a collision between Japanese and Korean fishermen at a place some 12 miles east of Wolsan. The origin of the trouble is not stated, but it is alleged that the Japanese acted on the defensive and that 20 of the Koreans were arrested by the police.

It is in contemplation to establish in Korea a Savings' Bank under Japanese direction. The principal projectors are the large shareholders of the First Bank and the 130th Bank. They are said to believe that there is no lack of the spirit of effective economy in Korea, and that people would gladly save money if they had any means of doing so safely. There is already a Savings' Bank carried on by a Korean called Cho Pyong-thaik, which, though a very unpretending concern, has obtained considerable success. This project suggests that the Japanese have considerable faith in Korean confidence. If Korean subjects consent to lodge their money in a purely Japanese Savings' Bank, we shall have a very convincing test of the mental attitude of the Koreans towards the Japanese.

Monday, July 25.

On the 25th inst. the Resident-General, and Mr. Ariyoshi, head of the Bureau of Affairs, were to be received in audience by the Emperor of Korea and were subsequently to visit the ex-Emperor. On the evening of that day the Resident-General was to entertain about 60 high officials at dinner.

The latest news from the Peninsula indicates that the general feeling of the Koreans is quite reconciled to amalgamation. But the great question of how to deal with the Yangpan class remains unsettled. Some publicists advise that the Yangpan should be treated as the Japanese shizoku were at the time of the Meiji Restoration. In other words, pension bonds should be issued for the support of these gentry. Some other persons contend, however, that the best way to satisfy the Yangpan is to give them official appointments, which have always been the object of their ambition. This second suggestion carries with it the obvious objection that official appointments would thus become the perquisite of men just as likely to be unfitted as to be fitted for such duties. There are, it is said, some 100,000 Yangpan throughout the Empire, and if they regard themselves as hardly treated, they may very easily ferment an insurrection much more serious than anything that has hitherto occurred. The probability is, therefore, that the pension-bond system will ultimately be resorted to. Meanwhile there is vague talk of amalgamation being effected either at the end of August or in the early part of September, but such forecasts must evidently be conjectures.

The Jiji Shimpō writes in a very strong strain upon this subject. It radically condemns the idea of being deterred by a small outlay. The conservative folks contend that it would be wiser to wait 4 or 5 years, by which time Japan's financial circumstances will be easier, but who can confidently say that a country expanding as Japan is will have more financial leisure 4 or 5 years hence than she has to-day? The probability is that every passing year will bring its own responsibilities, and it would be foolishly optimistic to sacrifice any important policy on the altar of vague hope. Besides, the Jiji does not see that any very large additional outlays need be involved in amalgamation. Japan is already bearing a tolerably heavy burden on Korea's account, and there is no apparent reason to suppose that amalgamation will increase that burden sensibly. The Yangpan can easily be disposed of by the pension-bond system, and as for the garrison army, there need not be any addition made to it. Thus the Jiji stands to its guns and insists upon amalgamation without delay.

Tokyo newspapers quote Dr. Hatoyama as discussing the interesting question of the procedure to be adopted in the matter of amalgamation. Taking the most modern instance, namely, that of Hawaii, it will be remembered that the Parliament voted to dispense with a sovereign and to ask for inclusion in the dominion of the United States. In Korea, however, there is no parliament, and therefore, the parallel plan would be for the Emperor of Korea to approach Japan with a proposal for amalgamation. As to foreign Powers, the treaties between them and Korea would have to be implemented by Japan until they were replaced by new agreements. Then the question would arise as to the individual rights extended to Korean subjects. Should they be accorded all the rights and privileges enjoyed by Japanese subjects? Dr. Hatoyama thinks this would be premature. His idea is that the Koreans should be treated as England treats the Indians or as Japan treats the Formosans, for a time at any rate.

Tuesday, July 26.

On the 25th inst., Viscount Terauchi, attended by a brilliant staff and escorted by a strong guard of honour, repaired to the Palace and was received in audience by the Emperor and Empress of Korea, and subsequently by the ex-Emperor and Lady On. Handsome presents were made by the new Resident-General to these Imperial personages, and we observe that among these presents the one destined for the Empress was a jewelled ring. The Emperor's address to Viscount Terauchi was of a purely formal character. Its gist was that His Majesty welcomed the new Resident-General and trusted that he would adopt measures for improving the administration of affairs and developing the national resources.

On the evening of the 25th, Viscount Terauchi invited about 250 leading Korean and Japanese officials to a party at the Residency-General. This reunion was by way of introduction.

Of course, all eyes are now directed towards Seoul, but that is precisely one of the reasons which make for a restrained policy on the part of the Resident-General. We can be tolerably certain that whatever Viscount Terauchi does, will not be done in a hurry.

Wednesday, July 27.

The new Resident-General has entered upon the duties of his office with great diligence. On the 26th inst he invited to the Residency-General 40 teachers of primary Japanese schools established in various parts of Korea. To these gentlemen he delivered a long address, inculcating the duties of loyalty to the Throne, patriotism and practical usefulness. It is said that the address lasted 40 minutes and that it abounded in sound commonsense. Subsequently the Viscount made minute and sympathetic inquiries into the condition of various schools.

It is stated that on the 30th inst. the Resident-General will entertain at the new official residence in Yongsan a party of about 2,300 Japanese and Koreans by way of introducing himself in his new capacity.

The Emperor of Korea has presented to Viscount Sone a tea-urn valued at 6,000 yen, in token of Imperial recognition of the services rendered by the Viscount to Korea.

The Chuo Shimbun, using conspicuous type, alleges that Great Britain, having been consulted about the incorporation of Korea in the Japanese Empire, has given her consent.

Baron Megata is quoted as saying that the annexation of Korea would mean an outlay of at least 10 million yen annually from the Japanese treasury. At present, the nominal income of Korea is 23 million yen. But only 15 million of that amount is actually collected from the Koreans. The remaining 8 millions represents money contributed by Japan. There can be no doubt that amalgamation would mean some reduction of outlays, inasmuch as the present dual system of administration would be done away with. But, on the other hand, Japan would have to accept many new responsibilities, and she could hardly hope to discharge them at less cost than 10 million yen. Where is this money to come from? No doubt the Korean taxes are capable of expansion; but it would be extremely bad policy on Japan's part to increase the people's burdens simultaneously with annexation. The result of such a course would probably be an insurrection costing many lives and much treasure. There is nothing for it, therefore, except that Japan should saddle the burden herself, and seek to develop Korea's material resources so that new factors of wealth may be created. For that policy, also, capital funds are required, and thus at every point the monetary difficulty confronts Japan.

Thursday, July 28.

The memory of the unfortunate reformer Kim Ok-kyun has been rehabilitated. A posthumous name has been given to him and a ceremony has been held at his former residence in the presence of several high officials. Kim undoubtedly was a man of noble aims, but we cannot forget that he sought to accomplish those aims by murderous means. In that respect he stands on a level with the assassin of Prince Ito and the would-be slayer of the Korean Prime Minister. It is a dangerous thing to attempt to differentiate motives which have a common end in lawless violence. The law-breaker should always be held criminal, whatever impulse may have nerved his arm.

We observe a paragraph in the fiji Shimpō which suggests that the Korean students, who recently returned from Tokyo, are engaged in a conspiracy of more formidable dimensions than was at first supposed. Our contemporary speaks of 30 having been arrested, but possibly that may be a mistake for 13. At all events the vigorous measures adopted by the police in Seoul seem to have struck terror into the hearts of the students in Tokyo. Several of the latter who contemplated immediate return to Korea have abandoned that idea, and are following a circumspect course.

THE MACAO AFFAIR.

It is stated that the Chinese Government in consideration of the attack made by the Portuguese on Hengchin Island in Kwolu Bay, has decided to approach the Portuguese Government direct through the Chinese representative in Lisbon, and at the same time to despatch a squadron for the purpose of protecting Chinese life and property on the island. As for the pirates it appears that a greater part of them have made their escape. Some accounts say that this was accomplished under cover of darkness, the Portuguese ships not having used their search-lights with sufficient vigour, but another and more credible story is that the fierce gale which has been reported from Formosa, visited Canton also, and rendered it impossible for the warships to remain at anchor off the island of Hengchin. Sixty Chinese, however, who are suspected of being pirates have fallen to Portuguese hands and are now in confinement at Macao.

It is plain that the Chinese consider that Portugal behaved ultra vires when she attacked Hengchin Island. They regard that island as lying beyond the limits of the Macao concession, and this last incident will render it necessary that practical steps for delimiting the frontier shall be taken immediately. It will be remembered that Portugal offered to submit this question to the Hague Tribunal but China declined that proposal, the alleged reason of her reluctance being a doubt as to whether an Oriental country could reasonably expect fair treatment at the hands of such a Tribunal.

According to Hongkong telegrams published by the Asahi Shimbun the Portuguese troops made a careful search of Hengchen Island on the 22nd inst., and found it completely deserted. It appears that the pirates managed to break the blockade and effect their escape in the darkness and during a storm. Nevertheless the Portuguese have managed to arrest no less than 400 supposed pirates, and it further appears that all the children whose kidnapping was the origin of the trouble were found on the island uninjured and were happily restored to their parents. The island of Hengchen is about 4 miles distant from the mouth of Macao Harbour, and it has always been a subject of dispute between the Chinese and the Portuguese Authorities, the latter claiming that it lies well within the boundaries of Macao, whereas the former insist that it lies outside those boundaries. The recent events will certainly not have the effect of strengthening China's claim. If the island lies within her territorial limits, the duty of preserving life and property there devolves upon her alone, and from the moment when her manner of discharging that duty is such as to necessitate the interference of an outside Power, China's title is seriously prejudiced.

The state of affairs at Hengchin Island has developed an interesting phase. It was supposed that, taking advantage of the recent gale which swept over South Eastern China, the pirates had all absconded from the island, and on this supposition the Portuguese ships and troops were withdrawn. But it subsequently transpired that the pirates had not left the island, but had taken refuge in a large cave where they are believed to have amassed quantities of arms and ammunition, food and plunder. Apparently this discovery was made through the agency of some of the kidnapped children, for the telegraph states that the troops were guided to the cavern by children. On the 25th inst. an attempt was made to enter the cave, but a volley of musketry received the intruders, one of whom was wounded and the detachment retired to await the arrival of the reinforcements. A volley of rifle-fire which, though delivered at short range, results in the wounding of only one man, does not suggest any very formidable resistance on the part of the pirates. It will probably be found, eventually, that the inmates of the cave are a very insignificant force.

This idea is confirmed by news from Hongkong which says that the leader of the pirates and several of his followers have been arrested in that colony, and that steps for extraditing them are believed to be in progress, though the local authorities are maintaining strict silence. It is evident that if the leader and several of his followers made their way to Hongkong, the inmates of the cave on Hengchin Island cannot be more than a remnant.

AMALGAMATION.

An anonymous Japanese juriconsult is quoted by several of the Tokyo journals as discussing the eventualities connected with amalgamation on the hypothesis that such a step was taken. He says that on the annexation of a country by a foreign Power, the former's treaties with outside States naturally cease to be operative. Such is not necessarily the case, however, with regard to the vested rights which had been created under the provisions of these treaties. These rights are as far as possible protected. But not necessarily so. Thus when the U.S. of America annexed Hawaii, Japan was in full enjoyment of the privilege of carrying on a steamship service between Honolulu and San Francisco, but after the incorporation of Hawaii in the U.S. Dominions, this privilege was taken away on the ground that the service assumed a coastwise character. The conclusion, therefore, is that only such interests are safe-guarded as may be consistent with the domestic policy of the annexing Power. Korea's treaties and conventions with foreign States are of three kinds. First, those concluded by herself in her own name; secondly, those concluded by her in conjunction with Japan; and thirdly those concluded in her behalf by the Japanese Government. The great majority of her conventions belong to the first category. Those falling under the 3rd heading relate entirely to posts, telegraphs and cognate matters, which of course would undergo no change, whereas the treaties concluded by Korea on her own account would naturally cease to be operative. Coming to the tariff, this authority admits that special considerations apply. Thus it does not follow and it might not be convenient that Korea should fall under the customs' system of Japan. It might be necessary to make some special arrangements such as those now existing with regard to Formosa.

CHINA.

Friday, July 22.

Shanghai sends news that the long-talked-of separation of the Post-office Administration from that of the Customs has been definitely decided. It will be remembered that when the system of post-offices was originally contemplated in China, the task of organizing a model was entrusted to the Maritime Customs which has long been regarded as a type of efficient and clever organization in the Middle Kingdom. Under the direction of the customs the service has been carried on for years in a most successful manner, but of course the arrangement was never intended to be permanent, and if the Chinese Authorities can now undertake the management of the system without the aid of the customs, they ought to be congratulated.

Saturday, July 23.

It appears to have been decided that Prince Tsai-Tao will not alight from the train at Harbin on his return journey to China, but will proceed direct to Changchun, where he will be met by a strong guard of Chinese troops. He will then go on to Mukden, reaching that city on the 29th inst. and spending two days there before taking train for Peking. This itinerary is said to have been arranged solely with a view to the better protection of the Prince's person. Of course, the Viceroy of Mukden will proceed to Changchun to meet His Imperial Highness. Harbin has now acquired an evil reputation, not only as the place where Prince Ito was assassinated, but also as a place where a plot was hatched to murder Prince Tsai-Tao's elder brother, Prince Chun.

Mr. Ishikawa Hanzan, Peking correspondent of the Hochi Shimbun, recapitulates the various attempts against high personages in Peking during the past few months, but evidently attaches little importance to them. He speaks with a certain measure of contempt about the revolutionary movement. It has not, according to him, any considerable dimensions, and its occasional ebullitions may be regarded as fireworks to keep public interest alive and to stimulate the influx of subscriptions.

Monday, July 25.

Order seems to have been restored at Laiyang in Shantung province, but we gather from the telegrams that the insurrection was sufficiently formidable to call for the services of a mixed brigade of Chinese troops. It is stated that the rioters acquired their strength mainly from the possession of modern arms and ammunition, and rumour has it that supplies of these weapons were carried to Laiyang from time to time in boxes made to resemble coffins. A telegram says that some Germans are disposed to indicate Japan as the source of these supplies, and of course it is not impossible.

The opium dispute at Canton appears to be developing an acute phase. The Viceroy of the Two Kwang is said to have memorialized Peking in the sense that the import duty has nothing whatever to do with the monopoly, and that no foreign Power has any title to interfere with China's right of imposing any domestic taxes she pleases. The Viceroy goes on to point out that whereas great diminution of the import trade has been asserted, the customs' returns do not support that contention. In 1908 there was a diminution of 3 per cent., but 1909 witnessed a more than corresponding increase. On the other hand, the domestic production of the drug has diminished by 70 per cent., so that smokers are obliged to rely almost entirely upon the imported staple. The Viceroy concludes by charging the British Representative with being misled by the interested statements of British merchants, and his Excellency goes so far as to add that whereas Great Britain professed at the outset to sympathise with the movement for the abolition of the opium vice, she is now helping to maintain it.

Prince Tsai-tao intends, it is said, to visit all the principal fields of Manchuria by way of sequel to his inspection of the armies of the West. This will detain him so long that his arrival in Peking is not likely to take place before the early part of August.

The dispute between Russia and China about the navigation of the Sungali River does not seem likely to be quickly settled. China's idea as to the identity of the river differs materially from Russia's idea. According to the former, the Sungali indicated in the Aigun Treaty meant the lower reaches of the Amur river, whereas, according to the Russian interpretation, the term applies to a branch of the Amur lying wholly within Chinese territory. It would seem that considerable time will be needed to reconcile this difference of opinion.

Tuesday, July 26.

It appears, according to a Mainichi Dempo telegram, that the Chinese Government has decided to order a cruiser from the United States of America and one from Germany. These ships are to be exactly of the same model as that recently ordered at the Maxim Yard in England.

The final step with regard to the Changsha indemnity, namely the scrutiny and endorsement of the various claims, has now been commenced in Peking. The largest claim has been put in by British subjects, which is natural, seeing that the property destroyed was in the main British.

The Hu river in the vicinity of Changchun has overflowed and a severe inundation has resulted.

Wednesday, July 27.

Prince Tsai-Chun is said to be about to pay another visit to the Occident. The 25th of August is named as the day of his departure, but we learn nothing as to the object of this tour.

Latest news from Macao is that order has been restored. Most of the pirates have effected their escape, but the kidnapped children have been safely recovered. The Portuguese gun-boats and troops have withdrawn from the scene.

It is now stated to be the intention of the Chinese Government to entrust Japan with the building of a gun-boat which shall form a unit of the resuscitated fleet. It will be remembered that, according to previous intelligence, one cruiser each was to be ordered in Germany and the United States of America, on the lines of the cruiser already building at the Vickers-Maxim Yard. The Japanese gun-boat is an addition to the programme. The telegram alleges that the Companies with which orders are to be placed express doubts about China's ability to pay, but it is explained that the money is to be taken from a fund amassed by the late Empress Dowager as property of the Throne. Eight per cent. of this is to be used for the navy and two per cent. for Palace buildings.

Sir Walter Hillier left Peking on the 24th inst. having resigned his post of Financial Adviser to the Chinese Government. He is to proceed to England via Japan and America. The Chinese Government has presented to him the Second Class of the First Order of Merit.

From Shantung comes news that Chui, leader of the Lai-Yang insurgents, has effected his escape to Tsingtao, and that the German Authorities have refused to extradite him on the ground that he is a political offender. This refusal is said to have caused much unbrage among the Chinese, who consider that the Germans are harbouring fugitive criminals. Japan used to be abused by the Koreans for extending a similar asylum to the fugitives from the Peninsula.

Somewhat important changes are announced in the personnel of the Waiwupu. His Excellency Liang Tun-yen retires on account of ill health, and is succeeded by Mr. Tsau Cha-lai. Mr. Hu, formerly Chinese Representative at the Court of Japan, becomes Vice-Minister. Other changes are announced, but they have no special interest.

Peking wires to the Tokyo Asahi that the Viceroy of Manchuria is disposed to think that unless China exerts herself vigorously, she will lose all hold in Manchuria. One immediate result of the new Russo-Japanese Convention will be, according to His Excellency's forecast, the gradual undermining of Newchwang's prosperity, as the linked Russian and Japanese lines will absorb all the traffic. To avert that result the Viceroy proposes to revive the project of dredging the Liao river, so that it shall constitute a really formidable competitor of the railway, and further, to improve the harbour at Newchwang. He has embodied this programme in a representation to the Throne, which document contains also a suggestion that every possible effort should be made to encourage settlers of nationalities other than Japanese and Russian. It is further stated that orders have been issued to the local authorities throughout Manchuria requiring them to insist upon the removal of all Korean settlers whose rights of residence are open to doubt. This last measure, if carried out with any resolution, is not unlikely to cause friction with the Japanese, as the latter have control of Korea's foreign affairs and are charged with the duty of protecting Korean life and property in foreign countries.

Serious inundations have occurred on the Noni river. Tsitsihar is virtually isolated and thousands of people are homeless. This calamity, coming in the sequel of last year's bad harvest, is very severely felt, and the situation is aggravated by the presence of hundreds of Hupeh immigrants who are deprived of sources of livelihood. Another evil feature of the situation is that the bank-notes issued by Chinese firms, being in excess of currency requirements, have fallen into a heavy discount.

Thursday, July 28.

The resignation of Mr. Liang Tun-yen has naturally suggested many theories, but they appear to be based merely upon conjecture. All accounts agree, however, in denying that the state of Mr. Liang's health constituted a valid reason for the resignation. His health is not seriously impaired nor is he in any way incapacitated for discharging his duties. One story, which has much currency, is that when the Prince Regent and the Council of State received news of the conclusion of the new Russo-Japanese Convention, they naturally consulted Mr. Liang, whose responsible position at the Waiwupu indicated him as the proper person to be questioned. Liang, however, was found to be entirely without any fixed opinion on the subject, or even any certain information. This proved a last straw. The Minister had been unpopular with his colleagues for some time back, and would have been allowed to retire had not a certain Power—the United States of America is evidently intended—interested itself actively in his behalf.

It will have been observed that during the past few days, rumours, more or less substantial, have been circulated with regard to a prospective entente between Russia and China. These reports are developing some consistency. The Russian Government is represented as being disposed to take the initiative, and steps are now in progress to collect materials. It certainly seems natural and proper that China herself should be admitted to the Council Chambers of the various Powers which undertake to dispose of her destiny. The trouble is that she has hitherto failed to develop any considerable measure of self-defensive capacity, so that no very great inducement offers to seek her coöperation for conservative purposes in the Far East. That is the truth. In the storm and stress of modern life, men who find themselves falling hopelessly behind the time, are apt to end the futile struggle with the bullet or the knife. A nation cannot commit suicide, but it can do something very similar.

Two Shanghai vernacular newspapers recently published a statement that the British Commandant at Weihaiwei had illegally ordered the police to enter and search the houses of certain Chinese subjects in connexion with the suppression of the opium vice. Criminal proceedings for libel were instituted against the two newspapers by the Commandant, and the case having been tried by the mixed court at Shanghai, the editors and publishers of the two journals were found guilty on the 27th inst., and sentence is to be pronounced to-day. This, so far as we know, is the first instance of a prosecution for libel being instituted against Chinese newspapers by British officials.

A telegram from Changchun says that the bandits, in that district have a grudge against the Taotai, and are planning to attach his yamen, while Prince Tsai-Tao is sojourning there. The Authorities evidently attack credence to this story, for they are said to have changed the dates of the Prince's movements.

CHINA AND THE NEW CONVENTION.

Saturday, July 23.

In a reply to the communication of the new Russo-Japanese Convention, the Chinese Government is said to have addressed to Japan and Russia a note which it proposes to circulate among all the Powers in the event of its receiving the endorsement of St. Petersburg and Tokyo. The Asahi Shimbun has obtained a copy of this important document, as has also the Fiji Shimpō, and the two papers publish it in their issue of the 23rd inst. The gist of the note is that China consents to the Convention but appends to her consent the interpretation she puts upon the document, namely, that it confirms and pledges its signatories to maintain the conditions provided in the various treaties and conventions that have been concluded with regard to Manchuria. It will thus be seen that China's declaration amounts to this, "I endorse the new Convention provided that its significance be so and so." Of course the Governments of St. Petersburg and Tokyo, since by the new Convention they have pledged themselves to maintain the status quo, will make no difficulty about accepting China's conditions of endorsement.

It is stated that at the Council of State held in Peking to consider the situation, three courses were proposed. One was to protest against the Convention; another to accept it on grounds of friendship; and the third to endorse it with a clear synopsis of its purport. This last was the course finally adopted, and Chinese papers are quoted as explaining that the Chinese Government is sensible of the necessity of walking hand in hand with Japan if the peace of the East is to be preserved.

Sunday, July 24.

The news is confirmed that the Chinese Government has frankly signified its approval of the new Russo-Japanese Convention in so far as it guarantees the preservation of the status quo fixed by previous treaties and conventions. The Chinese original which conveys this intimation is said to be much briefer and more precise than its English rendering.

The Peking Daily News praises China's action in this matter with much emphasis. It contends that inasmuch as she was not consulted beforehand about a convention which so closely concerns her interests, she would have been perfectly justified in protesting after the conclusion of the Convention. But that she has adopted the above course is at once magnanimous and friendly in the opinion of the Peking journal.

For our own part, while we unreservedly agree that China has chosen the wisest route and has shown an excellent spirit, we cannot see that Japan or Russia was in any way bound to consult Peking before concluding a Convention which does nothing more than pledge its signatories to observe, and to insist upon the observance of, conditions created by treaties to which China is already an assenting party.

The Kokumin Shimbun distinctly states that on the 21st inst. the Waiwupu handed to Mr. Ijuin an official document signifying China's acquiescence in the new Convention so long as its provisions do not contravene those of the Portsmouth Treaty or impair China's industrial and commercial rights in Manchuria.

THE AMERICAN SECRETARY OF WAR.

A San Francisco telegram to the Asahi Shimbun says that a certain New York journal wired to Mr. Dickinson to ascertain the impression produced on him by his visit to Japan. The Secretary of War's reply is quoted at length. He scouts the idea of war between the two countries; declares that there is nothing whatever to cause a rupture; describes as enemies to humanity and of their own country the persons, whether they be Americans or Japanese, who lend their voices to swell the war-cry; affirms that there is not and cannot be between the two countries any question incapable of solution by arbitration or other pacific devices; points out that Japan's attention is fully engrossed developing her material resources and dealing with the heavy burden of her national debt; and asseverates that even a whisper of war between the two countries is unthinkable, and that each would exert its utmost efforts to prevent any such calamity.

This strong utterance cannot fail to produce a good effect in the United States. But the truth is that very little occasion exists for seeking to produce good effects. The petty band of agitators who keep alive the talk of war, have their own selfish interests to serve, and will not be influenced wholesomely though a crowd of Dickinsons were to undertake their education. As for the vast bulk of the American nation, it needs no guiding in this matter. The bare conception of war with Japan is impossible to the intelligent American, and since it is equally impossible to the intelligent Japanese, both countries may sleep with high pillows, as the Eastern proverb has it.

THE SOY COMPANY.

Friday, July 22.

Tokyo papers allege that Marquis Inouye has agreed to act as a mediator between the Soy Company and its creditors. The first question to be determined is the amount put up by each of the directors towards the total of one million yen, which, as a body, they have decided to find. It is thought that some time will be needed to settle this point.

Saturday, July 23.

The clouds have again closed over the horizon of the Soy Company after a brief glimpse of a clear sky. A meeting was held on the 22nd inst. for determining the relative liabilities of the directors who, it was understood, were prepared to contribute altogether a sum of 1 million yen. But when it came to deciding how much each would put up, and when the Chairman's share was assessed at 600,000, a protest was immediately formulated by Mr. Tajima's legal representative, and the meeting broke up re infecta. The proceedings in bankruptcy have been stayed until the 27th inst., but there is now very little hope of avoiding that consummation. It will be observed that the directors of the Konoike Bank are justified by the event. They are understood to have expected that when it came to the actual putting up of a million the directors of the Soy Company would be found reluctant.

Sunday, July 24.

Things are becoming more and more complicated with regard to this unfortunate company. The shareholders having refused to pay up the sum of 400,000 yen, which is the minimum amount of their liability under the proposed liquidation, the directors decided that the enterprise must go into bankruptcy. In that event the shareholders will have to pay up willy nilly, and they are now said to be vehemently protesting against anything of the kind. The meeting on the 27th inst. promises to be a very stormy affair.

Thursday, July 28.

The shareholders of the Soy Co. held their deferred general meeting on the 23rd inst., and, after a stormy discussion lasting 3 hours, appointed an adjustment committee of five. It does not appear to be thought that matters have been much advanced by this step.

FORMOSA.

Friday, July 22.

There is no interesting news from Formosa this morning. Alike in the Gilan and the Shinchiku regions things seem to be in statu quo. The aborigines are not making any attacks, but there is evidence that their preparations for resistance have not relaxed.

Saturday, July 23.

The Japanese troops seem to have suffered a partial reverse in the Shinchiku region. On the morning of the 20th they were attacked by a considerable force of aborigines, whom they repulsed with a loss of 4 killed and wounded on the Japanese side. Then, on the following morning at 3 o'clock they moved out to attack a position held by the aborigines. After a short fight this position was occupied, but it proved to be so exposed that the assailants had to retire to a point where better cover was available. The fight was still in progress at the date of latest advices.

In the Gilan section of the field it has been decided to increase the Japanese force and to place it under the command of Major-General Koizumi.

Referring to the programme of which present events are a part, it may be well to recall the fact that the Diet in its last session voted a total sum of 15 million yen to be spent in 5 years upon bringing the whole of the aborigines into subjection. Of this period, 2 years were to be devoted to operations in the field; 1 year to subsequent pacification, and the remaining 2 years to development.

According to the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, the forces actually engaged on the Japanese side are, in the Gilan district, 7 companies of infantry, 2,000 Aiyu and 6 field-guns; and in the Shinchiku district, 2 companies of infantry, 600 Aiyu and 2 field-guns. Since the commencement of the operations there have been 160 casualties among the troops and 200 among the Aiyu.

The Asahi Shimbun's correspondent at the front writes as though Shinarek had not yet been captured. He represents the Japanese as much perplexed in finding roads to approach the positions occupied by the aborigines. We learn from this correspondent that the Formosans describe themselves as the "aborigines of Formosa" and their assailants as the "aborigines of Japan." In short, they claim to be an independent people.

Sunday, July 24.

The repulse of the company which advanced from the Shinchiku direction at 2.30 a.m. on the 21st inst., seems to have been of quite a serious character. At half past 4 a.m. the detachment suddenly found itself confronted by a band of about 200 aborigines who had lain in wait until the Japanese were within 10 yards' range when they opened a deadly fire. Moreover, they deployed, with the obvious intention of enveloping the Japanese, and as the latter had no available cover, they were constrained to retreat, which they did with 8 killed and 6 wounded.

In the Gilan section of the field, recent operations have been confined to the construction of wire entanglements and the consolidation of the positions already won. It appears that there is considerable doubt about the loyalty of the Keito aborigines. These people appear to be guided wholly by the aspect of the campaign. They become hostile at the first symptom of embarrassment on the Japanese side, and when things are going ill for the aborigines, the Keito folks are submissive and friendly.

The rains which set in on the 18th inst. destroyed the bridge over the Dakusui River and made wheel traffic impossible, but with the return of fine weather the bridge has been repaired and there is now no interruption of communications.

Monday, July 25.

The aborigines seem to be pursuing their customary tactics in Formosa. Owing to their great celerity of movement and to their familiarity with the country, they are enabled not only to keep themselves accurately posted as to all the doings of the Japanese, but also to concentrate rapidly for an attack on a particular point. They have indeed almost the capacity of mounted infantry. At present they appear to be delivering assaults at various points of the Japanese line. A scouting party led by Lieut. Nishimura was returning at dawn on the 22nd inst., when the aborigines opened a heavy fire and severely wounded the Lieutenant and a sergeant. Lieut. Nishimura managed to fight on and to carry back a report of the state of affairs, but he had no sooner delivered the report than he fell dead.

On the 23rd inst. by order of Major-General Koizumi, a force was dispatched to seize a hill overlooking the stronghold of the Karahasha aborigines at a distance of 4,000 metres. The position was occupied without encountering any opposition and artillery fire was to be opened from it on the 24th instant.

The subscription lists opened by the Tokyo newspapers for the purpose of supplying comforts to the troops at the front are obtaining munificent support.

Tuesday, July 26.

The situation in Formosa has not undergone any notable change. In the Shinchiku region, up to the morning of the 25th inst., things had remained in statu quo, except that the aborigines were making occasional attempts to snipe the Japanese.

In spite of the confident reports previously received, Shinarek Mountain appears to be still uncaptured. It is obstinately held by a party of 50 aborigines.

In the Bonbon-yama district nothing has been seen of the enemy since the storm which visited the place a few days ago. It is mentioned that the total number of officers and men on the sick list in the Gilan district is 62. Of these no less than 20 are laid up with kakke.

Wednesday, July 27.

A telegram from Taipeh, dated the 26th inst., says that the aborigines are at length beginning to weaken in the Gilan district. They are short of provisions and probably also of ammunition. In the Shinchiku part of the field, there is nothing special to report. A constant interchange of rifle-fire is going on, and the number of aborigines in the fighting line is estimated at about 200.

The Fiji Shimpō speaks of a reconnoitring expedition undertaken on the 24th inst. by a detachment of some 40 men under the command of Mr. Hagiwara against the Kuru aborigines. It was a night affair, and the idea was to burn out the aborigines if their position was found approachable. The result of this enterprise is not yet reported.

Thursday, July 28.

There is no decisive news this morning. Operations seem to be still on an isolated plan, and it is impossible to decipher any connected scheme of campaign, though such doubtless exists. The Kuruha appear to be the immediate objective, and one of their villages at least has been destroyed by fire. It is thought that considerable developments will soon be witnessed in this region.

In the direction of Shinarek mountain no progress is reported. Neither side is able to show itself without attracting the fire of the other.

In a valley called Chakul a Japanese reconnoitring party seems to have had a very obstinate conflict with the aborigines, but the issue is not yet reported.

The resignation of Mr. Oshima, Chief of the Civil Government Bureau in Formosa has been accepted.

A SUGAR TRUST.

Saturday, July 23.

The four companies engaged in the manufacture and export of sugar from Formosa are said to have formed a Trust by which all their transactions in future will be regulated. They will have a common agency for the disposal of their staple in the domestic market, and they will send abroad their surplus stock. With regard to this latter operation, they do not intend to exploit any of the markets southward of Formosa, since international complications might thereby be created. They will therefore have recourse solely to the markets of America and Korea.

Sunday, July 24.

Later news on this subject shows that the formation of the trust is due to excessive production in Formosa. Japan does not furnish a sufficiently large market to absorb the quantity produced, and the question is how to dispose of the remainder. Figures are given by some of our Tokyo contemporaries but the arithmetic is confused. One great question is that of rebate. All sugar entering Japan has to pay a consumption tax, which cannot be recovered if it is desired to export the sugar. Producers are therefore anxious to have it arranged that sugar imported into this country may be bonded pending sale to consumers or may have the tax returned in the event of export.

JAPAN AND AMERICA.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun pens a vehement attack upon the Hobsons of Japan. It calls these folks and their American prototypes "commercial politicians," and it declares that all their tall talk about notional defence and international complications is inspired by pecuniary ambition. In Japan there is no desire on the part of either the naval authorities or the dock-yards to manufacture a public opinion favourable to costly shipbuilding, but there is undoubtedly such an ambition in America, and it accounts for the whole agitation. The Nichi Nichi evidently aims its shafts at Mr. Takenokoshi, whom we recently ventured to call the Hobson of Japan, though our Tokyo contemporary does not indicate him by name. It says that all sensible persons in the two countries have hitherto regarded the menace of war as pure moonshine, but, none the less, if the agitation be kept up with sufficient persistence it may create a public opinion of its own.

FINANCIAL TROUBLE IN SHANGHAI.

Saturday, July 23.

It is stated that 2 or 3 Chinese banks have fallen into an embarrassed condition owing to speculations in rubber. They are said to be involved to a total extent of some 5 million taels. The rubber boom is certain to claim some victims, and we presume that this is the beginning of the trouble.

Sunday, July 24.

The intelligence this morning from Shanghai is not reassuring. It appears to be unquestionable that several banks have got into serious trouble owing to transactions in rubber shares. Three of these banks are said to have large transaction in general trade, and it is feared that if they close their doors a wide-spread influence may be exercised. A member of the Yokohama Specie Bank is quoted as saying that at the end of June news reached the Bank to the effect that several of the exchange shops (Chien-chwang) were threatened with embarrassment owing to purchases of rubber shares which they had not funds to take over. A later telegram, however, said that money had been found and that the crisis would be tided over. There are about 40 exchange-shops in Shanghai. They are run by individuals, but their owners are organized into a guild for mutual protection and assistance. It is not certain yet how far the guilds are involved, but at the date of the latest news a meeting of the threatened banks was said to be in conclave at the office of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank.

Tuesday, July 26.

The telegraph says that meetings took place on the 23rd and 24th in Shanghai at the Taotai's Yamen and at the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank's premises respectively. Representatives of Messrs. Jardine, Matheson & Co. and other leading firms, both Chinese and foreign, attended these meetings. The object of the conferences was to devise some means of averting the calamity which threatens three of the Chinese banks in connection with speculations in rubber shares. It was decided that if the guarantee of the Nanking Viceroy could be obtained, assistance should be rendered to the banks. The Shanghai Taotai at once set out for Nanking to confer on this subject, but the telegraph does not state exactly how or whence succour is to be given.

Wednesday, July 27.

Very disquieting accounts come from Shanghai. There has been a debacle in the rubber market. It appears that speculators showed some conservatism at the outset of the boom, so that there were only 5 rubber companies at the end of last year. But all restraint was thereafter removed, and in a few months' time the number of companies rose to 30, and the capital involved amounted to 30 million taels. The Chinese banks, which enjoy credit out of all proportion to their actual assets, were drawn into the vortex and are now threatened with ruin. A collateral misfortune is that the trade in cotton yarns shows signs of being seriously affected. Several of the Chinese banks are not only refusing to implement orders placed by them with Japanese firms, but are also calling up the accommodation previously given. Meanwhile, nobody will look at a rubber share, and there is no light whatever on the horizon. Very likely these reports are exaggerated. Some hyperbole is inevitable in such circumstances, but whatever allowances may be made on that account there remains a sufficiency of alarming material.

THE ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE.

Sir Edward Grey's speech at the luncheon in Hampton Court Palace in honour of the Japanese deputies and of the officers of the Ikoma has evidently created a profound impression in Japan. Sir Edward is quoted by the telegraph as having said that the new Russo-Japanese Agreement did not in any way impair but on the contrary materially contributed to secure, the original policy of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, namely the maintenance of peace, and his Excellency added that the renewal of the Alliance had been amply justified. The Fiji Shimpō welcomes these utterances in the strongest terms, and says that they will be received with delight by the Japanese nation at large. It was owing to the Alliance that disturbances in East Asia were replaced by calm, and that Japan emerged from those troubles with a full share of renown. All the other ententes subsequently concluded have been based upon this Alliance, and from that point of view, its consequences have been most far-reaching. The fact that the English Foreign Secretary seized such an occasion to make such a declaration is appreciated at its true value by the Japanese people.

The Nippon has an interesting article on the subject of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. It says, in effect, that by making friends with all the countries of the world Japan may possibly run the risk of failing to acquire any one real friend. There was first the Anglo-Japanese entente; then this was converted into an alliance; then followed an entente with France; then one with Russia; then one with the United States, and now another with Russia. All these things are sincere causes of congratulation and the Nippon is very far from desiring to minimize the value of any one of the compacts. But it insists that in riding upon this sunny sea of amity Japan should never lose sight of the ground which holds her anchor. That ground is England. Had not Great Britain set the example of joining hands with Japan, there had not been any alliances or any ententes whatever, so far as human understanding can discern. People are now rejoicing over the last compact with Russia, but they must not for a moment forget that that compact has its roots in the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, and that England is the friend toward whom Japan's eyes must always turn.

M. JULES LECLERCQ.

M. Jules Leclercq's interpretation of the "Japanese Soul" has justified the French journalists' judgment in publishing it, for it continues to be widely re-produced. In this 20th century one need only be sensational to secure an audience. Our readers may have forgotten all about M. Jules Leclercq. To refresh their memories we may recall him as the essayist whose recent contributions to the Revue Générale contained the following statements inter alia:—

"Under this feigned politeness, which is merely a mechanical and hollow piece of flattery, they conceal a profound aversion for foreigners. This feeling is ready at any moment to burst out into violence as brutally as the cannon shot with which the Japanese fell upon the Russians without previous declaration of war. This was, of course, a proceeding quite unworthy of a nation which boasts of being chivalric. The Japanese have studied our civilization merely for the sake of contending with us. Their cry is 'Death to the barbarians!'"

"I met at Kobe an English merchant who held the Chinese in high esteem, but had such a contempt for the Japs that he declared that their moral level was lower than that of the cannibals of Central Africa. Is it not surprising that, while the Chinese are perfectly honest in trade, the Japanese are the most openly dishonest of all civilized peoples? . . . With prodigious rapidity they have acquired a military education as a people, but it will take them two or three generations to acquire commercial education."

"Europeans generally leave Japan without regret, and with the impression that it is over-artificial and effete. The landscape offers to the eye neither variety nor surprise. The trees are too little; the people live in Lilliputian houses. They do not understand grandeur in architecture, and their temples are wanting in fine and noble lines. Their style is monotonous. We soon grow tired of what is so small and pretty, and when we bid good-by to Japan we find ourselves repeating the words of the old diplomat:—

"Flowers without scent;
Fruit without flavour;
Women without modesty."

To those that have studied the Japanese for years as numerous as the days devoted to M. Leclercq's examination, the thoughts that suggest themselves are, first, how can any civilized man be so grossly rude as to publish such a diatribe; and secondly, how can any reasoning man be so deluded as to believe such fictions? If a Japanese publicist, be he ever so insignificant—and Mr. Leclercq is described as a well-known French traveller and journalist—penned and printed such an attack upon any Western nation, what would be the unhesitating verdict of the world? It is, however, plain that M. Leclercq's reasoning faculties are so blunted as to render him almost irresponsible. Otherwise must it not have occurred to him to recognise that nothing conceivable is more impossible than for a nation to preserve during 60 years a perfectly polite and smiling demeanour towards folks for whom it entertains a "profound aversion"? Such a feat would be supernatural. What a parody M. Leclercq is of the typical Frenchman!

UNITED STATES NAVAL ARMAMENTS.

The Two Houses of Congress appear to be vying with each other in voting naval appropriations. The Washington Government, according to telegrams published by the Tokyo press, introduced into the Lower Chamber a bill providing for the construction of two monster battleships of 27,000 tons each and a big depot ship. The House did not consider this sufficient. It added 4 submarines and 2 coal-ships. In that form the bill was sent to the Senate, whereupon the latter augmented the programme by adding 6 destroyers. Usually the Government's demands in such matters exceed the nation's ideas, but in the case of the United States the people's representatives are evidently determined to go the Government one better.

It may be here mentioned that, according to a telegram to the Asahi Shimbun from San Francisco, the Washington Government has decided to despatch a squadron of 18 battleships to European waters at the close of this year. This big fleet will visit various ports and will include the Mediterranean in the field of its cruise.

BARON D'ANETHAN.

With the profoundest regret we record the death of His Excellency Baron d'Anethan, which took place at 2.30 a.m. on the 25th inst. in the Belgian Legation in Tokyo. For several months the Baron had been suffering from an illness which was recognized as incurable. He was perfectly sensible of the fact that death must soon overtake him, yet he never lost his cheerful fortitude nor ever failed to take a keen interest in every-day affairs. His bravery and his patience were in truth a model. Baron d'Anethan served as Belgian Minister in Tokyo during a space of some 20 years, and throughout the whole of that time he took an invariably luminous view of Japanese politics and of Far Eastern complications. Never once did he err in judgment and invariably his procedure was justified by events. His personality was eminently lovable, and among all those who had the honour and pleasure to make his acquaintance at his hospitable home in Tokyo, there is not one that does not cherish his memory with affection and respect. The deepest sympathy will be felt with his bereaved widow.

The Tokyo press has naturally a great deal to say about the late Baron d'Anethan. From information supplied by the Secretary of the Legation, it appears that the late Minister's first connexion with Japanese affairs was in 1871, when he was appointed by the Belgian Government to be a member of the committee organized for the reception of the Iwakura mission at Brussels. His Excellency arrived in Yokohama in 1873, as second secretary of Legation, and 3½ years later he became secretary, thereafter moving to the Belgian Legation which was then established in Tokyo at Nagatacho. He subsequently served for several years in Brazil and Washington and ultimately returned as Minister to Tokyo in 1893.

Tokyo newspapers universally recognize that the death of this illustrious diplomat is a heavy loss to Japan. From the very outset he seems to have had an intuitive perception of this country's capacities, and he never wavered in his friendly attitude though he was always frank in his criticism. His last wish was that his body should be buried in the country to whose service the best years of his life had been given, and in compliance with that wish his grave will be in Aoyama cemetery. He leaves a host of sorrowing friends.

Among those whose appreciations are published by Tokyo newspapers is Mr. Nagasaki, Chief Chamberlain. He speaks in the warmest terms of the noble character and high intellect of the deceased, and he recalls the fact that during 10 years the Baron acted as doyen of the corps diplomatique, taking the leading part in all the functions at the Palace. Mr. Nagasaki speaks also of the distinguished literary ability of Baroness d'Anethan and says that she has the profoundest sympathy of the Japanese nation in her bereavement.

Mr. W. H. Stone has been interviewed by a representative of the Asahi Shimbun and is quoted as speaking in warm terms of the great diplomatic ability of the deceased; ability so fully recognized that the Baron was always the tribunal of appeal in any difficulties. Mr. Stone recalls his unvarying friendship towards Japan, and says that Baroness d'Anethan, whose literary ability has won for her wide distinction, did not yield to her husband in good will towards this country.

We understand that a short service will be held at the Belgian Legation at 6 p.m. to-day (Wednesday), after which the remains of the late Baron will be removed to the Catholic Cathedral, Tsukiji, followed by any intimate friends who may wish to be present.

The official part of Thursday's ceremony will end with the Requiem Mass, which will be attended by the Diplomatic Corps in uniform. Afterwards friends who may desire to do so will accompany the cortège to Koishikawa Cemetery.

If any proof were wanted of the universal esteem in which the late Baron d'Anethan, the Belgian Minister at the Court of Tokyo, was held by all classes of the community, and for the widespread sorrow at the demise of this distinguished diplomat, this proof was strikingly afforded at the funeral service held yesterday morning at 8 o'clock in the R.C. Cathedral, Tsukiji, Tokyo.

The remains had been removed from the Belgian Legation to the Catholic Cathedral, Tsukiji, on Wednesday evening. A short service was held at the Legation at 6 p.m., after which those personal friends who had attended the service, proceeded in carriages to Tsukiji, following the hearse. The procession was headed by a mounted policeman, followed by three carriages containing the numberless wreaths which had arrived at the Legation since last Monday.

Immediately following the coffin was the carriage conveying Baroness D'Anethan, who was accompanied by her niece, Miss Haggard, and Mrs. Bonar. The six pallbearers (Mr. Idaka, Interpreter of the Belgian Legation; Mr. Yoshida, of the Foreign Office; Dr. Fuehr, of the German Embassy; Lieut.-Colonel Boger and Lieutenant Piggott, of the British Embassy; and Colonel Dani, of the Austrian Embassy), followed in two carriages, bearing the deceased Minister's decorations. The carriage procession of nearly half a mile was watched by large crowds of townspeople, who lined both sides of the route the whole way to Tsukiji. In the neighbourhood of tram lines, the cars all came to a standstill as the mourners passed. Among those present were H.E. Sir Claude MacDonald, Baroness Sannomiya, Count Kagawa, Count and Countess Toda, Mr. and Miss Anker, Admiral Dundas, Mr. Rumbold, Mr. Hobart-Hampden, Mr. Strong, Captain Boyle, Mrs. Dani, Miss Sullivan, the Belgian Chargé d'Affaires, and a few other personal friends of the late Baron. The body was deposited at the Cathedral at 7 p.m., after which the company dispersed.

Long before the appointed hour on Thursday morning, the roads leading to the Cathedral were lined with a vast concourse of people, while half a division of troops, infantry, cavalry, and artillery, under command of Major-General Semba, were drawn up along these main thoroughfares. The little church itself was packed to its utmost capacity by a distinguished company, including the Ambassadors, Ministers, and the entire Staffs of all the Embassies and Legations represented in Tokyo. H. I. M. The Emperor was represented by his Court Chamberlain Mr. Nagasaki, while The Empress, and the Imperial Princes and Princesses, were severally represented by specially appointed Court functionaries. Count Komura, the Minister for Foreign Affairs with Baron Saito, the Minister for the Navy, together with the Ministers for the Interior, Education, and of the Imperial Household, personally represented their respective Departments of State, while the Army and Navy Departments had sent some of their most prominent officers to testify to the respect in which the late minister had been held. The Governor of Tokyo represented in his person the Tokyo Community. Bishop Cecil of Tokyo, Viscount Aoki, Baroness Sannomiya (who had specially travelled from the interior to be present) and many prominent members of all nationalities were present.

The inside of the Cathedral, draped in black, presented a most striking spectacle. The profusely decorated and heavily gold-laced uniforms of the high Civil and Military dignitaries assembled, formed a brilliant frame around the bier upon which the coffin was lying, buried under an enormous mass of wreaths and flowers. Half way up the aisle, and in front of the pulpit the magnificent floral tributes covering the mortal remains of the deceased, had immediately alongside of them his widow, his niece, Miss Haggard, together with Mrs. Bonar, the wife of H.B.M.'s Consul General at Seoul and an intimate friend of Baroness d'Anethan, who had travelled post-haste from Seoul to attend the ceremonies, while Baron Henry de Woelmont, the Belgian Chargé d'Affaires, stood as Chief Mourner at the head of the Coffin.

The impressive requiem mass, according to the elaborate rites of the Roman Catholic Church, was conducted with full choral service by Père Everard, Supérieur de la Mission, and preceded by a salute of 19 guns, the report of which reverberated through the little church, but after the benediction had been given the Imperial band stationed outside the Cathedral struck up a marche funèbre. The officiating priest, preceded by his acolytes, then headed the procession filing slowly out of the church. Immediately following him came the coffin, carried by the following intimate friends of the deceased statesmen. Dr. Fuehr of the German Embassy; Lieut.-Col. Boger and Lieut. Piggott of the British Embassy; Col. Dani of the Austro-Hungarian Embassy, Mr. Yoshida of the Foreign Office, and Mr. Itaka, Interpreter of the Belgian Legation. After the coffin, draped with the Belgian flag, had been placed in the hearse standing before the Cathedral doors, the British Ambassador led the widow of the late Baron d'Anethan to her carriage which then proceeded to the Koishikawa Cemetery only attended, at the express wish of the family, by the nearest friends and relatives of the late Minister, while the numerous friends and official representatives dispersed after taking leave of the Belgian Chargé d'Affaires at the entrance to the Cathedral.

THE ANGLO-JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

A member of the Tokyo Municipal assembly who has just returned from London, and who speaks through the columns of the Fiji Shimpō, describes the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition as a signal failure. He says that a very wrong impression prevails as to the enterprise being supported by the Governments of the two countries. It has no connection whatever, with the British Government, and if a few special exhibits be excepted, there is practically nothing worth looking at in the British section. As for the Japanese section it has been planned and managed entirely on commercial principles under the direction of a Polish Jew whose one idea throughout is to make money. Many of the principal Japanese exhibitors are now complaining that if they had known what was before them they never would have sent anything to the Exhibition, and are bitterly regretting the false impression that the whole show must create as to the dominant character of Japanese civilization. This informant goes so far to say that the question of the Japanese Government's responsibility is not unlikely to be brought up in the next session of the Japanese Diet.

The Fiji Shimpō has one of its eminently sensible articles on the subject of the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition. So far as we can make out, the Exhibition itself is highly creditable to Japanese manufacturers and to the Japanese management in general, but some of the side-shows are not very edifying, and there is a great outcry among Japanese in London lest the conduct of wrestlers and other professionals should be taken as illustrative of the manners and customs of the Japanese nation. But the Fiji wants to know what is to be taken as illustrative. If the city of Tokyo could be spirited across the ocean on some magic carpet and dumped down in London, would the Japanese residents of the British Metropolis be content to accept the over-sea city as truly depicting everyday life in Japan? They would have to do so, and yet undoubtedly there would be much to injure their self-esteem. After all, Japan remains Japan, and even in the most highly civilized countries the best picture of manners and customs has its reverse. There is nothing specially to be ashamed of in that. But what is to be said about the behaviour of the upper classes who may reasonably be supposed to have the reputation of their race at heart? Our contemporary says plainly that the behaviour of these people, not the incidents of a side-show at an exhibition, constitute real reasons for humiliation. It goes on to elaborate this theme by speaking of the manners and methods of Japanese tourists and cognate matters. Undoubtedly, a volume of precepts relating to the rules of social etiquette as observed in Europe and America might be published with great advantage in Japan, but on the other hand, there is in the Japanese social code many a feature which, imitated in the West, would add materially to the graces of life.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun discusses the same subject but from a different standpoint. It attaches little importance to the success or failure of a solitary exhibition, but it attaches great importance to this demonstration of the fact that foreigners and Japanese do not understand each other sufficiently to be partners in business. One hears a great deal of talk of the introduction of foreign capital for coöperative purposes, but it is tolerably plain that the English and the Japanese nations have still to form a better mutual acquaintance before that hope can be realized. We, Japan Mail, do not quite see the connection between side-shows at the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition and coöperative industrial enterprise in Japan, but we quote the Nichi Nichi Shimbun as an evidence of what the Japanese are thinking.

ELECTRIC POWER COMPANIES.

There is further talk of amalgamating the Anglo-Japanese and the Kinugawa Hydro-electric Power Companies. On the 21st inst. a meeting of the promoters of the former company was held in Tokyo, when it was decided that, so far as amalgamation was concerned, no objection will be raised, but everything depended on the conditions, and Messrs. Asabuki and Otaguro were commissioned to confer with the Kinugawa folks in order to arrive at a clear understanding of the latter's views. It is added that the English shareholders of the Oigawa group have also intimated their willingness to amalgamate if satisfactory terms can be made.

According to the Kokumin Shimbun a difficulty has arisen with regard to the amalgamation of the Anglo-Japanese and the Kinugawa Hydro-Electric Power Companies. We explained in our recent issue that the water power in the lower reaches of the Kinugawa was in the hands of the Otaguro section, whose charter expires next December, unless work of construction is commenced by that date. No satisfactory scheme can be devised, however, for utilizing the lower reaches of the river independently of the upper, and the converse difficulty exists with regard to the upper reaches, which are in the hands of the Kinugawa Company. The amalgamation of these two parties of projectors became therefore inevitable, and there was no hesitation in agreeing that the establishment expenses of the Otaguro group, namely, 200,000 yen, should be endorsed by the combination. But the chief shareholders of the Otaguro group are also largely interested in the Oigawa Anglo-Japanese project, and they are working to bring the latter in also. On the Oigawa scheme, however, a sum of 700,000 yen has been expended, and the Kinugawa folks are very unwilling to saddle their enterprise to that extent. At present the difficulty looks insuperable.

FLOODS IN NORTHERN MANCHURIA ETC.

Telegram from Changchun indicate that devastating floods are out in the Tsitsihar region. The water is said to have reached a level 3 feet higher than its maximum point in 1908, when the inundation was said to be greater than anything witnessed for 30 years. A great deal appears to depend upon an embankment at the Noni river. When the latest advices were telegraphed, this embankment was in a perilous condition, and if it gave way very serious results must ensue.

In southern Korea, also, floods are prevailing. The Masan Railway is under water and traffic is suspended.

As for Japan she is surrounded by menaces of storms, as is usual at this season. There are small centres of depression in the south of Hachijojima and in the north of Manchuria, and there is a more serious phenomenon of the same nature, which, having made its first appearance between the Ogasawara and Marianne Islands, has approached Ryukyu, whence it may possibly make its way to Japan. Otherwise, the climatic conditions are quiet enough, but the temperature is slightly below the normal.

BANQUET IN TOKYO.

On the 21st inst. a banquet was given in Tokyo at the Bankers' Club by the leading bankers of the city to the business-men who recently visited China and to others who have just returned from tours in the West. Baron Shibusawa acted as principal host and proposed the healths of the returned travellers. Mr. Okubo, of the department of Agriculture and Commerce, and Mr. R. Kondo speaking on behalf of the business-men tourists, delivered short addresses. Mr. Kondo said that he endorsed the truth of the old proverb that if one wants to hear news of Yedo, one should enquire of a new-comer rather than of a constant visitor. He himself had been so often in China that he really had nothing novel to relate about that country, but he might venture to say that the recent visit of the tourists had produced an excellent effect on the relations between the two people, and he hoped a hearty welcome would be given in Japan to any Chinese tourists who might visit this country.

Mr. Odagiri, formerly Japanese Consul in Shanghai, and now a leading official in the Specie Bank, alluded in strongly condemnatory terms to the attitude of indifference maintained by Japan towards Indian commerce. He pointed out that the exports from India to Japan exceeded 60 million yen last year, whereas the exports from Japan to India did not amount to 15 millions. An idea prevailed that the climate of India made it a difficult country for foreigners to reside in, but such was not the case really. Japanese could live very comfortably in India. Yet at the present moment the total number residing did not exceed 400 and of these no less than $\frac{3}{4}$ were women who pursued a disgraceful career, so that only about 100 were genuine tradesmen. The Japanese Government did not even appoint a Consul-General in India, and the knowledge possessed by the Japanese of the state of affairs in the Great Dependency was lamentably deficient. A great deal of talk had been heard recently of tours of business-men to China and America. That was all very well in its way, but why not organize a similar tour to India?

CAPTAIN HOBSON.

This gentleman, who may fairly be called the stormy petrel of Far-Eastern politics, has been lecturing at Toledo in Ohio on the subject which seems to obsess him perpetually. He declares that the insufficient defence of the Pacific coast offers an invitation to Japanese aggression; he urges that a powerful American fleet should be massed on the Pacific, and he maintains that the relations between Japan and the United States are going from bad to worse. Certainly, so far as Captain Hobson's doings are concerned, this last proposition is unquestionable. The speeches and the writings of men of his persuasion must gradually embitter the relations between his country and Japan, however great may be the friendship felt towards each other by the bulk of the two nations. We have no right to suppose that Captain Hobson is not perfectly sincere. He doubtless believes in the reality of the dangers which he so persistently depicts. But it is an infinite pity that some means cannot be devised for muzzling the gallant Captain and all his fellow-thinkers.

HOKKAIDO.

Saturday, July 23.

The Diet in its last session gave its consent to the programme introduced by Mr. Kawashima Jun., Chief of the Hokkaido Administration. This programme contemplated a total expenditure of 7 million yen spread over a period of 15 years, that amount to be contributed by the State, and to be augmented by appropriations from the local funds whenever such became available. We gather from Tokyo journals that this scheme is working very satisfactorily, and that in addition to 2½ million yen contributed by the Government during the current fiscal year, a further sum of 900,000 will be available from the local funds.

Sunday, July 24.

The mountain called Usudake, which is one of the volcanoes in the neighbourhood of Volcano Bay, began to be very uneasy on the morning of the 22nd, from which time onwards it emitted frequent rumblings and volumes of smoke, these phenomena being attended by earthquakes. Numbers of villagers have made their escape to Muroran. It is stated that Usudake erupted actively four times between 1661 and 1850 so that its periodical disturbance is now overdue. In two of the above four cases loss of life resulted.

Monday, July 25.

Usudake continues to give ominous warnings. There have been 18 strong shocks of earthquake and 230 minor shocks, and the Toya lake has fallen by one foot. An eruption is regarded as inevitable. All the inhabitants of Date Mura, numbering about 15,000, have been obliged to leave their houses and are flocking in the direction of Muroran.

Tuesday, July 26.

On the afternoon of the 25th inst. at 3.35 o'clock, the seismic disturbance at Usu-dake developed such proportions that 60 houses were destroyed wholly, and 30, partially, in the village of Abuta, while in the village of Date the entire population was driven out. In the bay of Usu an eruption of sand took place and a small island was formed at a spot where previously there had been a depth of 4 fathoms. It should be explained that these phenomena have occurred on the east coast of Volcano Bay, and that the distance from Date to Muroran is about 25 miles.

It is not expected that this disturbance will develop any very serious proportions; Usu Hill is only 2,000 feet high, and, though an active volcano, has never shown any great destructive force.

What has most to be apprehended is a tidal wave, to which the Ainu are said to be looking forward with much apprehension. There does not seem to have been any loss of life hitherto. The people showed great reluctance to abandon their houses in Abuta village and the Authorities were obliged to issue peremptory orders. The number of persons who are rendered homeless is put at 8,000.

Wednesday, July 27.

Seismic conditions have become a little quieter at Usu-dake. On the 25th instant there were 3 or 4 severe shocks of earthquake, and some 40 minor shocks, but since then things have been calmer and the worst appears to be over. Outside the village of Usu several large fissures opened in the ground, and a number of houses were overwhelmed by land-slides. At Abuta village a store-house was partially wrecked, and the ground was fissured at several places. The report received as to the formation of a new island in Usu Bay proves to be incorrect, but a new crater has been blown out on the south-west face of the mountain, and a great number of solfataras have been created. There has been no loss of life, so far, but great apprehensions are entertained as to the danger of a tidal wave. It is stated that a party of house-breakers took advantage of the confusion, and to restrain this abuse it was found necessary to post police in the deserted village and to organize a band of self-protectors.

Thursday, July 28.

On the 25th inst. at 10.20 p.m. the seismic disturbance which had been almost continuous since the 21st inst. culminated in the formation of a new crater. The site of the latter was at a point about 100 feet below the summit of a small hill, some 600 feet in elevation, lying behind Tokotan. The crater is oval-shaped, with a greater diameter of 40 yards and a lesser of 30. The ejectamenta were carried to a distance of over 7 miles and were deposited in places to a depth of 3 inches. This effort seems to have exhausted the violence of the disturbance, for things have been quieter since the opening of the crater. Of course, there are the usual phenomena of trees overturned or reduced to white skeletons. It is stated that the column of ashes and smoke discharged from the crater reached a height of 300 feet. There has been no loss of life, so far, but about 10,000 people are said to be homeless and destitute.

JAPAN'S FINANCE.

We find in the Nippon Shimbun an interesting statement of Japanese finance which our contemporary attributes to an official source. The information is published in a tabular form. In the first place we have a table showing the sums which actually have passed into the Treasury's hands during the current year. Table (A) is as follows:—

	Yen.
Ready Money subscription to the 1st, 4-per-cent. loan	30,000,000
Carried over from the previous year's consols	21,000,000
This year's consols	60,000,000
Ready money subscription to the 2nd 4-per-cent. loan	15,000,000
Proceeds of bonds floated in France ...	156,300,000
Sum remaining after paying back 93 million yen of endorsed 4-per-cent. bonds in England	3,400,000
Total	285,700,000

The second table shows the purposes to which a part of the above money has been applied:—

	Yen.
To redemption of Naval Bonds and Consols	30,000,000
To redemption of War Bonds	86,000,000
Total	116,000,000

Subtracting the total in table (B) from that in Table (A) the remainder is 169,700,000, which will be applied to purposes of redemption this fiscal year, as follows:—

	Yen.
5-per-cent bonds to be redeemed after July	50,000,000
Second redemption of Tobacco Monopoly Bonds	34,000,000
Total	84,000,000

This leaves 85,700,000 to be still disposed of. Moreover, it may confidently be expected that the two operations of redemption shown in Table (C) will produce some ready money payments from the public. Calculating these ready money payments at 15,000,000 in the case of the 5-per-cent. Bonds, and at 10 millions in the case of the Tobacco Bonds, we obtain a total remainder of 110,700,000 to be carried to next year.

Passing now to the funds available for redemption next year we have the following:—

	Yen.
Residue from Table (C)	110,700,000
Sum appropriated in the budget of next fiscal year	70,000,000

Total

The next point is the amounts falling due for redemption next year. They stand as follow:—

	Yen.
Emergency Bonds	279,093,000
3rd period Treasury Bonds	59,024,000
Tobacco Bonds	4,605,000

Total

It will be observed that the total in Table (E.) exceeds that in Table (D.); in other words the assets in sight are less than the liabilities to be discharged. But it has to be remembered that the Deposits Bureau, the Imperial Household and the Bank of Japan hold fully 100 million yen worth of bonds which will be re-written. It is further a reasonable expectation that from 72 to 73 millions of securities will be presented by the general public for re-writing. If these facts be taken into consideration it would be seen that the situation is assured.

THE TREATIES.

It is explained by a Tokyo newspaper that the U.S.'s interpretation of the duration of the present treaty is not prompted by any desire whatever to embarrass Japan. Neither does it make any material difference to Washington whether the period of the present treaties terminates at the end of 12 years, or whether notice of its termination has to be then given. The simple facts are that the prerogative of ratifying Treaties rests with the Senate of the United States, and as the treaty is explicit in fixing its own minimum life at 12 years, the Senate cannot be asked to change the letter of the law without some good reason. There can be no doubt that in amending the text of the original Treaty so as to read in the sense now attached to it, the U.S. Senate desired to abbreviate rather than to prolong the time of the document's duration, the idea of the Senate being to avoid long-period obligations. But, unfortunately, the amendment had a different effect, since it virtually assured the Treaty a life of 13 years instead of 12. The Mainichi Dempo believes that the only exit from the dilemma is for Japan to frankly acknowledge the situation and to address to the State Department of Washington a request that the U. S. Treaty shall be placed on the same footing as the Treaties of all the other Western Powers. Equipped with such a request, the President would be in a position to approach the Senate with a good chance of success.

A REPORT from Nagano says that at 10.54 a.m. on the 20th instant a rather severe shock of earthquake was felt in that district. A loud rumbling sound was heard in the district of Sakagi,

THE TARIFF.

The following portion of a letter to The Times is well worthy of perusal:—

An attempt has been made to introduce into this question arguments for Tariff Reform, but it would be most unwise to complicate the matter by any such addition, which, moreover, appears to be irrelevant to the present considerations and particularly so when Japan's trade with Britain and various other foreign countries is considered in detail. For the major part of England's imports from Japan consist of raw materials, while in the case of foreign countries their "bargaining power," if existing and if employed, would be used for the benefit of their own exports to Japan and not for those goods in which England is pre-eminent. Only the United States and France have larger imports from Japan than Great Britain has, but if those were used for "bargaining" it would be to benefit an export to Japan of very different goods from those dealt in by this country. Other foreign nations import so much less from Japan than Great Britain does that their "bargaining power" must be small.

Our negotiations for a reduction of the tariff must, therefore, be based on different grounds from these.

What is required is that the British Government should make it clear to the Government of Japan that it is their intention to support, uphold, and assist by every means in their power British commercial and shipping interests, and not only that in view of our long-standing and consistent friendship in all dealings with Japan they expected and required a special convention for British goods, but also that any such course of action as was foreshadowed in Count Komura's speech in the Japanese Diet a few months ago (viz., the granting of conventional tariffs to certain Continental countries, though not to Great Britain) would influence our diplomacy in future dealings with Japan.

It is, there is reason to believe, the case that for some months past the German Ambassador to Japan has been in negotiation with the Japanese Government regarding the duties upon those articles which are of most interest to German traders, but the British Embassy is not known to be taking any action, and is credited with the opinion that the advances in the tariff are not of such importance that the British merchant will suffer seriously.

It is hoped that members of Parliament from the districts chiefly concerned, well provided with facts from their constituents, will, by questions in the House and general insistence, make sure that the British Government take up a strong line in this important question.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

DUNCAN G. LAW, President Bradford Chamber of Commerce (Incorporated)

Exchange, Bradford, June 15.

We invite the Fiji Shimpō's attention to the above. The Fiji has suggested as an exit from the present situation that to England, as a most favoured nation, there should be extended gratis all such concessions as other Powers may acquire by bargaining. But there are two obvious difficulties. One is that foreign Powers would be unwilling to pay for concessions which were to go to England without payment; the other, that the concessions for which foreign Powers might be disposed to bargain are not at all likely to be of any benefit to England.

Sir Edward Grey's statement in the House of Commons that the British Government is conferring with the Japanese on the subject of the tariff has naturally awakened much interest at this end of the world. The Asahi publishes a statement said to have emanated from a Japanese official. His name is not given, and we suspect it will be very difficult to identify him, but the view attributed to him is that this tariff question is being subordinated to the purposes of party politics in Great Britain. He thinks that the question of free trade and fair trade has assumed concrete proportions in consequence of the Japanese problem, and that considerable trouble may ensue. It appears to us (Japan Mail), however, that the history of the complication up to the present cannot be reconciled with the theory attributed to the above official. It is from the men actually interested in the trade that the protest against the new duties has emanated, and we may take it for granted that these hard-headed merchants are swayed solely by facts and have not allowed themselves to be carried away by any economic vertigo. They believe sincerely, and they are certainly qualified to form a belief, that British manufactures will lose a market representing roughly 10 million yen worth of demand if the new tariff be applied in its entirety. It is possible and, indeed, probable that the advocates of fair trade have welcomed this opportunity for practically illustrating their contention; but it is neither possible nor probable, in our opinion, that the present Government of Great Britain is approaching the controversy from the standpoint of party politics. Moreover, we are firmly convinced that Japanese statementen will not thus misconstrue British action.

GRATUITOUS INSULTS TO MISSIONARIES.

Replying to the Kobe Herald's strictures on the Japan Herald's advocacy of an anti-missionary society, the latter journal writes thus:—

Our contemporary tries to ridicule an anti-missionary society as an absurdity by comparing it with such impossibilities as societies against business-men, journalists and explorers. But missionaries do not stand on the same footing as business-men, journalists and explorers. If all business-men gave false weight and measure, if all journalists were prevaricators, if all explorers were Dr. COOKS, we say we would not only approve of societies "anti" all such harmful members of society; we would if possible join such and subscribe to them.

Now what does that mean? What can it mean except that missionaries are all—all without exception—dishonest men? The Japan Herald approves the idea of an anti-missionary society. It would also advocate an anti-business-men's society, would "join it and subscribe to it," "if all business-men gave false weight and measure"; it would advocate an anti-journalist society "if all journalists were prevaricators"; and it would advocate an anti-explorers' society "of all explorers, were Dr. Cooks." Hence it constructively declares that all missionaries are deceivers and liars. There is no avoiding the conclusion. It is scarcely possible to be more insulting or more untruthful. The Japan Herald must know well that in no other section of the community is moral rectitude in all its phases more highly valued and more rigorously respected than in the missionary section. That such men should be arraigned by such a slanderer on such charges is the very extreme of effrontery.

A FALSE PREMISE.

We have already adverted to the attempts of the Japan Herald to prove the inherent mendacity of missionaries, but its methods well repay study. In its issue of the 22nd inst., it reproduces extracts from the account of the World's Missionary Conference furnished by our own correspondent, places these side by side with another and fuller report, and then makes the remarkable discovery that there are statements in the more detailed report that are not to be found in our report. It then gratuitously assumes that our correspondent is a missionary, and from this false premise, with the above "interesting little discovery" for a jumping-pole, leaps to the fond conclusion that all missionaries are liars. It would have been as well for our infidel contemporary, with its professed veneration for "logic," to have at least made sure of its premises before arriving at its conclusion. Our correspondent is not a missionary. If the Japan Herald were not blinded by its own atheistic prejudices, it might have observed, in the concluding paragraph of our report, a virtual statement to that effect. We reproduce the paragraph in question, italicizing the words which show the independent status of our correspondent:—

With the exception of the unsympathetically received utterances of one or two speakers who deprecated any attempt at unity until the Greek and Roman communions were willing to join—which will surely be in the Greek Kalends—not a jarring note was heard throughout the entire Conference, the predominant features of which—as they appeared to an outsider—were unity of feeling and of purpose, a clear recognition of the present time as the golden moment of opportunity in every great mission field, an equally clear perception of the causes that have militated against success in the past, and a decidedly business-like determination to put the entire work of missions—at least on its intellectual side—on a higher plane.

The "outsider" from whose necessarily abbreviated account the Japan Herald draws such unwarrantable inferences is one who has recently retired, full of years and honour, from the service of the United States Government. But this excellent specimen of the atheist journal's "logic" deserves to be placed on record. Here is the syllogism:—

- (1) The Japan Mail's correspondent is a missionary;
- (2) He has been guilty of a suppressio veri;
- (3) Therefore all missionaries are liars.

Of course the third of these propositions is a conclusion at which this organ of "rationalism" has long since arrived. It is now engaged in the congenial task of looking for evidence to justify its own discreditable conception. We can not congratulate our contemporary on the result of its researches up to the present. Meanwhile, as the first of the above two premises is false, and the second open to dispute, the intelligent reader will know just how much value to attach to the Japan Herald's "conclusion," and its methods generally.

MR. BRAHAM.

Mr. Braham, assistant editor of the foreign department of the Times, arrived in Tokyo at 8.30 p.m. on Monday and proceeded at once to the Imperial Hotel. We regret to learn that the distinguished journalist has not been very well since leaving Vladivostok, but it is probable that a short sojourn in Japan will restore his health. A representative of the Fiji Shimpō went as far as Kozu to meet Mr. Braham, and had some interesting conversation with him. He learned that Mr. Braham had been Times correspondent in Constantinople, in Berlin and in St. Petersburg, from the last of which cities he had been required by the Government to withdraw owing to the severity of his criticisms on affairs in Russia. With regard to the new Russo-Japanese Convention, Mr. Braham is quoted as saying that it is heartily welcomed in England, since it constitutes another guarantee of the peace of East Asia.

We gather that Mr. Braham will spend some months in the East and that his sphere of observation will extend to Korea, Manchuria and China.

UNILATERAL.

The Japan Gazette says:—

There is actually no such thing as a "unilateral" Convention. In her past commercial treaties Japan doubtless made concessions in her tariff to foreign nations, but in every case it will be found that she obtained a quid pro quo from those nations. Notably in the last treaties she obtained the abolition of extra-territoriality in Japan. Her treaties were quite fair, and, under them, her foreign trade has advanced by leaps and bounds. This constant complaint that they were "unilateral" is not only an insult to her negotiators, but entirely ignores the substantial diplomatic benefits that accrued additionally to her trade progress.

As to the proposition that there is no such thing actually as a unilateral convention, we must assume that it is formulated with reference to Japan alone, for as a general statement it is obviously untenable. Even when its application is thus limited, however, we doubt whether it can justly be maintained. As a matter of fact, the conventional tariff now in operation was not a concession made by Japan to Foreign Powers, but was rather a concession made by Foreign Powers to Japan. Europe agreed to double the import duties of the old tariff in consideration of Japan agreeing to postpone for 12 years the complete recovery of her tariff autonomy. Surely it is therefore a misnomer to speak of the present conventional tariff having been purchased with the abolition of extra-territorial jurisdiction? That would imply that the Foreign Powers made two concessions to Japan in exchange for nothing. Consular jurisdiction and the tariff were, in our opinion, quite independent. For the abolition of the former, Japan agreed to open the whole country to foreign trade, travel and residence. And for agreeing to postpone the full recovery of her tariff autonomy Japan was permitted to double the existing import duties. But these things are mere matters of history. The important point is that so long as Japan's tariff was dictated to her by the force majeure of a combination of Foreign Powers while they themselves remained free to impose any duties they pleased on her commodities, just so long was the tariff unilateral, and all the academical discussion in the world cannot obscure the fact.

MANCHURIA.

A fresh complication appears to have arisen in Manchuria. The Local Assembly at Chinchow having addressed to the Viceroy in Mukden a representation to the effect that 50 Korean subjects were unlawfully engaged in agriculture at the former place, the Viceroy replied that those aliens must be required to take their departure inasmuch as their presence in the district in question was not consistent with Treaty. These 50 Koreans appear to have been peacefully engaged tilling the fields, but of course it is quite conceivable that they were working outside treaty limits. Nevertheless the Viceroy's decision is said to have created some consternation inasmuch as at Hsinmintun and other places in Manchuria many Korean subjects are earning their livelihood by farming, and it would follow that all Koreans so engaged outside the specially marked region in the neighbourhood of the Long White Mountain are violating the law.

There is a somewhat inconclusive telegram from Harbin to the Tokyo Asahi Shimbun. It says that there are two strong bodies of bandits operating in Mongolia. As to one of these bodies no information whatever is given, but the other is said to have assembled in the neighbourhood of Manjuri station, and to be making its way steadily southward towards Yaonan. Its objective point is supposed to be Tofuto, and as the bandits are robbing and murdering en route, the unfortunate inhabitants have nothing for it but to abscond.

There are 3 competing Tobacco Companies in Manchuria. One is called the To-A Enso Kaisha, and is a Japanese concern, having its principal places of business at Dairen and Port Arthur. The second is called the Ei Bei Enso Kaisha and has its headquarters at Newchwang, and the third is a Russian Company located at Harbin. The Russian Company does not appear to be making much progress in a southern direction, but the Anglo-American Company, by cleverly catering to the taste of the Chinese for their own tobacco, is said to be driving the Japanese Company to the wall.

MR. MATSUTANI.

Saturday, July 23.

This celebrated character seems likely at length to be brought to book. In the sequel of a prolonged investigation, the final phase of which lasted from 4 p.m. on the 21st instant to 3 a.m. on the 22nd, evidence was obtained justifying a charge of forgery, fraud and malversation. This is the gentleman whose machinations kept the Rice Exchange in a ferment for several months, and whose latest escapades in connexion with the Jinju Insurance Company were on everybody's lips for some days. He is generally spoken of by the Japanese newspapers as "Tenichibo," to establish his likeness to the celebrated impostor who attempted to usurp the Shogunate in the days of Yoshimune.

Sunday, July 24.

According to this morning's news a barrister named Kawashima has been arrested on a charge of collusion with Mr. Matsutani. The story is that this person acted simultaneously as the legal adviser of the Insurance Company and of the bank from which it borrowed money, and that he played fast and loose with both his clients.

THE TANKO S.S. COMPANY.

We observe that newspapers like the Niroku Shimbun and the Nippon are publishing erroneous statements as to the conditions imposed by Admiral Baron Yamanouchi in connexion with his acceptance of the post of Chairman of the Seikoshu. These journals inform their readers that another source of friction has declared itself between the Tanko S.S. Co., and the Seikoshu, and that the next general meeting will be the scene of a fresh commotion. We can only recommend our readers to receive all such statements with extreme reserve.

The Shogyo Shimpō says that the Tanko S.S. Co.'s returns for the first half of this year show a net profit of 600,000 yen, and if to this were added 400,000 brought over from the previous half-year, a dividend of 2 or 3 per cent. could be declared. But it has been decided to carry the whole amount forward and to write down the value of the stocks of coal held by the Company.

THE "TETSUREI MARU."

The Osaka Shosen Kaisha steamship Tetsurei Maru, which left Dairen on the 21st inst., bound for Bakan, ran aground in a thick fog on an island between Quelpart and Mokpho. She had on board 246 passengers, among whom was Mr. Cunningham, British Consul at Osaka. The passengers were all sent forth in 6 boats, but at the date of the latest advices only two of these boats were reported to have reached the shore. As, however, the sea was calm, and as numerous islands exist in the vicinity, no apprehension is entertained about the safety of the passengers. Several vessels have hastened to the scene to render assistance. The Tetsurei Maru is a ship of 2,142 tons.

The Tetsurei Maru has now gone to the bottom, only the tops of her masts being above water. At this moment of writing (Tuesday morning), there are still 70 persons missing, namely, 40 representing the crew of the steamer, and 30 passengers. There is a theory that these 70 persons remained in the vessel and sank with her, but as no bodies have been found, the idea is scarcely tenable. Neither is it at all likely that all the crew have been lost. It will probably be found that the missing people have effected their escape to some island in the vicinity.

According to an official report from the Kwantung Government Office to the Department of Communications, an official who had been in charge of mails on board the steamer Tetsurei Maru arrived at Mokpho on Sunday afternoon. The Tetsurei Maru, he said, ran on a rock at 7.45 p.m. on the 22nd instant. Immediately he ran to the room where the mails were placed, but it was already so full of water that he could save none of them. The mails on board the vessel, amounting to 133 bags, were thus all lost. They could not be salvaged unless a diving apparatus was employed.

A report from the Osaka Shosen Kaisha says that the steamer Kamiyo Maru has arrived at Fusan having on board six first-class passengers, including the British Consul at Osaka and a Russian merchant, nine soldiers, three women, six children and fifteen others.

MEMORIAL SERVICES HELD IN TOKYO
FOR HIS LATE MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII.

H. M. King George Vth has read with deep interest the despatches forwarded by H. M. Ambassador in Tokyo reporting on the Memorial Services held for His late Majesty King Edward Vth in Holy Trinity Cathedral, Tsukiji, so courteously placed at the disposal of H. M. Embassy by the Right Reverend Bishop McKim; on that held in the East Hongwanji Temple in Tokyo and conducted by the Reverend Count Otani Soncho; as well as on the Shinto Ceremony held on the 20th May last and conducted by Viscount Honda.

The British Ambassador has been consequently commanded by His Majesty King George to convey to those who so kindly manifested their sorrow and sympathy and by their presence and assistance at these Memorial Services contributed to so solemn an observance of this sad occasion, His sincere appreciation of the tribute thus paid to the memory of His late Majesty and His grateful thanks for the many kind expressions of condolence which have been communicated to Him from Japan.

PORT ARTHUR.

The Italians were the first to pay a congratulatory visit to Port Arthur after the opening of the harbour to trade. The British followed immediately afterwards, and now we learn that an American squadron has steamed into the place, and that the Admiral and his principal officers have been entertained by the local authorities.

It is stated that the Japanese engineers have drafted their final plans for converting Port Arthur into a suitable commercial harbour. The idea is to cut a wide canal across the isthmus of Tiger's Tail, and thus create a new entrance entirely for naval purposes. Pending the completion of this cutting, a large wharf will be built on the west harbour and the approaches to it will be dredged. The sum required for the first year's operation of these works is $1\frac{1}{2}$ million yen.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Friday, July 22.

A marked improvement was witnessed yesterday and the market closed firm.

Saturday, July 23.

The market was very weak yesterday, without any specific cause other than a general feeling of depression. Doubtless something of this may be attributed to the fact that Japanese securities are temporarily out of favour in London.

Monday, July 25.

Proximity of settling day and absence of any encouraging cause produced a dull feeling yesterday, and prices were barely maintained.

Tuesday, July 26.

The market opened dull yesterday, and though some improvement was seen in the afternoon session, it proved very slight.

Wednesday, July 27.

The unsettled state of the weather and the news of a bad market in London have produced a depressed feeling in Japan.

Thursday, July 28.

The tone of the market yesterday was tolerably firm, though little business was transacted. Saturday being settling day, the session on the 28th lasted during the forenoon only. We append the quotations for September delivery:—

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

There was held in Tokyo on the 21st inst. a meeting of the committee appointed to investigate the question of overhead and underground railways in the city. It will be remembered that there are two companies in the market. One proposes to build an overhead line along the banks of the Sumida-gawa; the other wants to construct an underground road through the centre of the city. The committee showed considerable perplexity vis-à-vis this question. It did not appear that the members were even prepared to discuss the matter intelligently, and they finally separated for the purpose of collecting further material.

The Times Exhibition number was published on the 19th inst. Advanced proofs were forwarded to Tokyo so as to reach that city simultaneously with the publication in London, the intention being that Tokyo papers should have access to them at the earliest possible opportunity. All the leading journals comment on the fact and say that they must necessarily abstain from reproduction until the full number comes to hand, which will be about the middle of August.

The Municipality of Tokyo is now in possession of lands reclaimed at Toranomon, Kotohiracho, Uchi-saiwaicho and elsewhere. The total area is 15,000 tsubo, and it is proposed to sell this at 40 yen a tsubo, thus obtaining a sum of 600,000 yen, which could be devoted to the building of the much talked of City Hall (Kokaido). Forty yen a tsubo seems much too cheap for land in such positions. We should think 80 or 100 yen would be nearer the mark. However, the Municipal Authorities have not by any means decided yet whether the land should be sold or whether more profitable results would not be obtained by renting it. As between these two propositions there surely cannot be much doubt from the point of view of yen and sen? The Municipality can easily get a return of 10 or 12 per cent by renting the land.

The Agricultural and Industrial Bank of Tokyo is said to have decided to take advantage of the easy condition of the money market by floating a loan of half a million yen. The rate of interest will be $5\frac{1}{2}$ and the issue price 98. It is believed that people will tumble over each other to obtain blocks of this loan. Not only is it the first loan made by the Bank, but also the terms are eminently favourable. Mr. Toyokawa, of the Mitsubishi Ginko, is quoted as saying that his Bank would gladly take the whole of the loan.

There has been for some time talk of establishing a new bank in Tokyo under the name of "Kabuto Ginko," so called because its locality will be Kabutocho, the site of the Stock Exchange. The Bank is to be the financial organ of the Exchange. Its shareholders will consist solely of brokers and members of the Stock Exchange. The capital is to be 2 million yen, and the proportion which has to be paid up in order to satisfy legal requirements, namely, one-fourth, will be obtained from the funds now standing to the credit of the various brokers. It appears to be thought that this Bank will be quite inadequate to affect the situation materially. It may contribute in a small degree to the facilities for spot transactions, but that will be about its limit.

It is stated that Mr. Shiraishi, director of the Toyo S.S. Company, who is now in the United States, has effected an arrangement putting an end to the relations hitherto existing between the Japanese Company and the Pacific Mail S.S. Co., and establishing a similar relation with the Western Pacific S.S. Co. Mr. Shiraishi and Mr. Avery, the Toyo S.S. Co.'s agent at San Francisco, have reached New York, where the final agreement has been signed.

The Japanese are not resting on their oars in the matter of aerial navigation. Some experiments which are described as having been very successful, took place on the 24th inst. on the Ishibashi plain near Utsunomiya. The aeronauts were Major Tokunaga and Captain Ito. They ascended to a height of 800 feet and after traversing a distance of 1,500 metres alighted safely and easily. The machine used is said to have been of a Russian type.

A dinner is to be given by the International Press Association of Japan at 7 p.m. on Friday, July 29th, at the Imperial Hotel, in honour of Mr. Braham, of the London Times, Mr. Seitz, who recently arrived at Tokyo as the New York World's special correspondent, and Mr. Zumoto, who is to leave Yokohama on August 3rd for New York.

The Tokyo Gas Company held an extraordinary general meeting on the 25th inst., and decided unanimously to increase its capital from 17 million to 35 million yen. Moreover the action of the directors in purchasing the Furukawa coal works was approved.

It is stated that the Railway Board has decided to lay down two more lines of rail between Tokyo and Yokohama having a gage of 4 feet $8\frac{1}{2}$ inches, and to employ electricity for driving the trains on these additional lines. Passengers only will be carried, and the time between Yokohama and Tokyo will be materially shortened.

We read in the Yamato Shimbun that there is at length a prospect of the cement companies forming a league. There has been talk of this from time to time and we are not in a position to say whether the latest rumour is more credible than its predecessors.

The party of 18 Japanese students who recently set out under the guidance of Mr. Suzuki Otohei for a tour in Siberia, reached Nicholaiesk safely, and from that town proceeded up the Amur to Habarovsk, where they are said to have received a most cordial welcome. This party of tourists must be said to be particularly fortunate, for their arrival in Russian territory synchronizes almost exactly with the conclusion of the new Convention.

The Mainichi Dempo says that the Government, is considering a scheme for converting the pawnbrokers' business into a State monopoly. The project seems to be still in embryo, but the main purpose is to bring cheap capital within the reach of the poorer classes. Our Tokyo contemporary, in connexion with this theme, makes some novel statements about pawnbroking in Europe and America.

New York seems to have had one of its sweltering days on the 25th inst. There were no less than eleven deaths from sunstroke. People were driven to sleeping on the roofs of their houses, and the Parks were filled to overflowing. It is an interesting coincidence that the 23rd inst. was the hottest day of the year in Japan.

THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE BILL AND THE PROBLEM OF THE SEX.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 23.)
(COMMUNICATED.)

ON the 12th instant, as reported in our telegraphic columns, the second reading of the Bill for extending to Parliamentary elections the municipal franchise already held by women was passed by a majority of 299 to 109 votes. While this may be hailed by the suffragettes as a triumph, or the first of a series of triumphs, it constitutes in reality a hollow success which, in our opinion, will do no more than mark the beginning of strife. Indeed, its evil effects are as likely as not to recoil, in the first instance, upon the heads of the ASQUITH Ministry. For the Prime Minister and certain of his colleagues are virtually playing with a question which, rightly or wrongly, is regarded seriously, and with almost frantic enthusiasm, by a large number of women, whose capacities for making trouble for the Government have been fully demonstrated in the past. To afford facilities for the second reading of a Bill and then to refuse its further progress is a proceeding which resembles that of the ill-natured youth who held a biscuit out to a hungry dog and then struck the animal across the nose when it eagerly reached forward to seize the proffered gift. In one respect, we admit, the analogy is not complete. Mr. ASQUITH may be freely acquitted of any deliberate intention to deceive, for he made his position perfectly clear to the deputation of Female Suffragists that waited upon him prior to the introduction of the Bill. He reminded the promoters of "Votes for women" that he was opposed to their cause; that, nevertheless, "in view of the increasing amount of attention excited in the country by the question," the House of Commons ought to have an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it; but that the "prospects of such a measure passing through all its stages, or even being submitted to the ordeal of all its stages, were exceedingly remote." This remoteness has been now brought home to the Suffragists by the rejection of the motion to send the Bill to a Grand Committee—which means, of course, the shelving of the measure. It will be noted that, significantly enough, the majority by which the motion was rejected was considerably larger, with practically the same House, than the majority for the second reading, namely, 145 as compared with 109. Indeed, we should not be wide of the mark were we to say that the second division indicates the real attitude of the House towards the measure. The first division, in favour of the second reading meant very little more than nothing. A small section of the Commons are doubtless sincere in their support of Mr. SHACKLETON'S Bill. In the majority of cases, however, the votes have been cast by members, doubtless in fulfilment of election pledges, but also in the full knowledge that these votes can have no practical effect in the direction of legislation this session, or, in all probability, during the life of the present Parliament. This sounds cynical, no doubt, but, as a London journal remarks, "there is nothing the ordinary Member of Parliament enjoys more than voting for woman suffrage when he knows that his vote will be resultless." Some of the Female Suffragists are still clinging to the barren hope that, despite such engrossing and critical issues as the Constitutional question, Home Rule and the Budget, the over-laboured Commons will find time for a measure more contentious and, in a sense, more revolutionary, than any of these. Such a hope, of course, is vain; and when the suffragettes, militant or mild, discover how they have been fooled, Mr. ASQUITH and the Liberal Party will doubtless have their attention drawn to the matter in a personal and practical manner, respectively. The tactics of the Suffragists, it must be confessed, closely resemble those of the Constitution-wreckers, in that they trust to rushing their revolutionary proposals through Parliament, by hook or crook, before the country is aroused to the gravity of the change and its far-reaching consequences. There is at least one body, however, that is determined that the country should be enlightened as to mischievous effects of handing over the Empire to petticoat government at the cost of the destruction of the home and the ruin of the race. We refer to the Women's National Anti-Suffrage League, which, under the energetic leadership of such women as Lady JERSEY, Mrs. ARCHIBALD COLQUHOUN and Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD, has been unusually active of late. A great protest meeting "against votes for women" was arranged to take place at the Queen's Hall on the 11th instant, with the Earl of CROMER in the chair. The great Proconsul is known to be an uncompromising opponent of Woman Suffrage, and the character of his views may be gathered from a recent pronouncement upon the subject. "The issue at stake," said the late Representative of England in Egypt, "is that the supreme government of the British Empire, which has heretofore been in the hands of one sex, shall be transferred to the two sexes, in which the female is numerically greatly superior to the male. Why should the vast fabric of the British Empire be made the dumping-ground for a crude experiment which has never yet been tried by any other of the great nations of the world?" In this statement of opinion Lord CROMER treats the subject from the Imperial, rather than from the sociological and racial, point of view; but in our opinion these aspects of the matter transcend even the other in importance, for whereas the one affects but an Empire, the others have the profoundest bearing, for good or ill, on all humanity. As to the numerical preponderance of women, a recent writer in The Times attributes to this very fact all the ills of which the modern woman complains. The whole status of woman has suffered in consequence, there has been "a certain cheapening of the sex," and an embittering of many individual women "who have had no choice between a scramble for a husband and the struggle for hard and ill-paid work." The remedy, claims this writer, is to turn that majority into a minority. Women would then find themselves—if the commercialism of the expression be pardoned—at a premium: "those who prefer to marry would have ampler opportunity; those who prefer to work at those branches of employment at which women excel would find their services in demand, the remuneration offered fair and adequate." It must be remembered that, as far as Britain is concerned, "there are a million women in the wrong place." This excess should be removed to the Colonies, where women are wanted—not, of course, the society popinjay or the "bachelor-girl," who are neither flesh nor fowl nor good red-herring; but women who are prepared to be the mates of pioneers, the bearers of children, the makers and keepers of homes. It is by such means as these that the women of England can effect an adjustment of their grievances, while at the same time fulfilling the highest functions of womanhood. The Parliamentary vote is no panacea for the ills of the sex. Those who, for its pursuit, are giving up so much—all indeed that, to the average woman, makes life worth living—will find it in the end a barren quest. It glitters, but is not gold.

"TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS."

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 26.)

IF that very elusive journal, the Japan Gazette, possessed any acquaintance with the modern history of Japan, its comments might be nearer to the point. But so innocent is it of any knowledge of the annals that it denies the propriety of the epithet "unilateral" as applied to Japan's original conventional tariff, and condemns as wanton mischief-making the statement that force majeure had much to do with the arrangement of that tariff. Yet the facts are that the 5-per-cent. tariff was one of two concessions made to Sir HARRY PARKES in 1865 when he repaired to Kobe at the head of a united squadron. Sir HARRY'S programme was to require three things; first, the ratification of the treaties by the Emperor; secondly, the reduction of the tariff to a 5-per-cent. basis, and, thirdly, the opening of Osaka. He was prepared to make one concession on his side, namely to remit the remainder of the Shimonoseki indemnity; but since the Japanese Authorities declared themselves unready as yet to guarantee the security of foreign life and property in Osaka, it was decided to postpone the opening of that port, and in the sequel the 5-per-cent. tariff and the Imperial ratification were obtained without any concession whatever on the foreign side. There can be only one epithet for a tariff negotiated in such circumstances, and that epithet is "unilateral." Everybody except the Japan Gazette knows these things, but there would be no occasion to allude to them did not that journal persist in its silly denial as to the propriety of the epithet "unilateral" which the Japan Times and other Tokyo journals have employed. But when these things are admitted, what follows? Does it follow that all conventional tariffs are necessarily unilateral or that Japan should not, if possible, conclude one with Great Britain? Of course not. The past is past, and its history need not be repeated. Japan recovers her tariff autonomy next year, and she will then be competent to negotiate what tariff conventions she pleases. Naturally, no publicist is so giddy as to lay down the hard and fast rule that tariff concessions are purchasable with customs' rates alone. Mr. BALFOUR is telegraphically reported as saying that although England's free-trade policy deprived her of weapons for a tariff war, there was nothing to prevent her negotiating with Japan for better terms. It is to be hoped devoutly that the Unionist leader was speaking advisedly when he made that remark,—if indeed he did make it—and that some such exit from the present situation may be found. We have entire faith in the sincerity of the Japanese experts who drew up the new Tariff. We believe that they endeavoured to make things as easy as possible for British importers. But their success does not appear to have been commensurate with their goodwill, and if diplomacy can find some means of removing the present impasse, everyone will be gratified.

THE CONFERENCE AND THE SITUATION.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 27.)

THE announcement as to the political situation which appeared in our telegraphic columns yesterday contained, despite its brevity, two items of the first importance. These are (according the message a full measure of credibility) that the Constitutional Conference has virtually arrived at a successful issue, nothing remaining to be settled but "the details;" and, secondly, that an early election—viz., in the autumn or in January—is not expected. Another version of the telegram gives this information on the strength of a statement by the Lord ADVOCATE, Mr. URE, of Old-age-pension fame. Ever since Mr. URE's "frigid and calculated" incursion into the realm of political fiction, he has been regarded as the Ananias of the

Radical Party, and it may be remarked that a similarly confident prediction came from the same quarter a month ago. Seeing that the proceedings of the Conference have been regarded from the first as confidential, and that the desperate attempts of the Radical Extremists to extract from the PRIME MINISTER an official statement as to its progress have failed, it is not a little surprising that, before the conclusion of the discussion, the Government should put up its most discredited member to make a public statement as to its proceedings. Of course the deliberations of the Council of Eight have, since their inception, been the subject of many rumours, adverse and otherwise. In its early stages, it was more than once whispered in the lobbies that the Conference had broken down. On the other hand, at the beginning of July, Mr. JAMES O'GRADY, Labour M.P. for East Leeds, declared that "a settlement had already been fixed in the minds of both parties," and that "the Liberal Government was going to get 95 per cent. of the points they had been asking for." However, as the Radical cry all along has been "the Parliament Bill, the whole Parliament Bill and nothing but the Parliament Bill," as their irreducible minimum for the basis of a settlement, doubtless the Labour Member's optimistic estimate was begotten rather of desire than of reason. Nevertheless there is no inherent improbability in the information contained in yesterday's telegram, although it was anticipated in well-informed quarters that the meetings of the Conference would continue till well on into the autumn—a belief which in part accounted for the anxiety of the Radicals for a statement to be made as to its progress before the House rose, or, failing that, for an autumn session, so that no settlement should be carried into effect while Parliament was not sitting. Indeed, it may be claimed that the postponement of the final stages of the Budget till November indicates beyond dispute the desire of the Government to defer, to the latest possible period, the crisis which must come with the conclusion of the Conference, whether a settlement has been reached or not. On the other hand, the Council of Eight has now met six times, and it is known that several promising schemes, containing at any rate the seeds of a solution, have been brought forward for consideration. One of these is outlined in the The Times of July 8, and consists, in the main, of the formation of a Joint Committee of the two Houses for the settlement of disputes in all matters of ordinary legislation, while the House of Lords resigns the right of rejecting Money Bills, on the understanding that an impartial authority shall be set up to decide on questions of "tacking." Of course the idea is not a new one, but the suggested composition of such a Committee—which is the main consideration—shows some elements of novelty. Thus it is proposed that the Lords and Commons should nominate an equal number of representatives, the Upper House contributing an equal number of Liberal and Unionist peers, while the moiety from the Lower House should reflect proportionally the strength of the respective parties. Hence, in the suppositional case given by the London journal for purposes of illustration, if the number of the Joint Committee was 100, there would under present conditions be nominated to it, for the Commons, 21 Liberals, 3 Labourites, 5 Nationalists and 21 Unionists; and for the Lords, 25 Liberal peers and 25 Unionist peers. The objection which naturally presents itself to the composition of the Committee on these lines is that the great preponderance of Unionist sentiment in the House of Lords is not correspondingly represented on the Committee; and that, consequently, if the voting in the Committee was carried out on strict party lines, the Government of the day could secure the passing of any measure over which the deadlock had arisen. However, it would no doubt be possible to adjust the numbers with such nicety as to secure the requisite impartiality. As to the formation of a Joint Committee constituting a solution of the present crisis, it might be regarded as a possible means to that end, but in itself, of course, it would be no settlement at all. The various issues raised by the Radicals would be found in statu quo. The House of Lords would remain as it was, and the Veto question still await solution. Mr. REDMOND would continue to demand Home Rule under threat of sending the ASQUITH Ministry into the wilderness, and the precise part to be played in the Constitution by the CROWN would still be liable to be subjected at any time to the same unseemly discussion as that which is said to have hastened the death of King EDWARD. We venture to hope therefore that if the Conference has indeed reached the end of its deliberations, it has accomplished something better than merely devising a means for dealing with future deadlocks. As to the non-occurrence of a General Election at an early date, it is clear, as we have already pointed out, that, whatever may be the issue of the Conference of 1910, as compared with its prototype of 1884, the real crisis will arise when its decision is submitted to Parliament. The factions by whose sufferance the Government has so far been permitted to remain in power will not tamely submit to a compromise involving, as any compromise must involve, the sacrifice of their favourite schemes. With the diminishing prospect of Home Rule, on the one hand, and Single Chamber Government, on the other, the extremist storm will burst, with accumulated force, about the heads of the ASQUITH Ministry.

RACIAL ANTAGONISM.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 28.)

(COMMUNICATED).

IT is impossible for Englishmen to look with indifference upon the extraordinary outburst of racial antagonism, evidenced by a widespread series of riots, which, in the sequel of the recent prize-fight, disfigured so many parts of the United States. We say it is impossible for Englishmen to look unmoved upon this turmoil, not because they are in haste to condemn, but because, in their world-wide Empire, they are likely at any time to find themselves confronted with the same problem of the "colour-line," and, conceivably, in the same aggravated form. It is difficult for Britons at home—more so, perhaps, than for Britons abroad—to understand how the mere fact of the defeat of a white man by a black, in the more or less discreditable surroundings of the prize-ring, should become the signal for an outbreak of racial riots from New York to Colorado; and the conclusion which forces itself upon the impartial onlooker is that a vast amount of racial hatred must be simmering below the surface if so small a provocation as the unpopular issue of a pugilistic encounter is sufficient to cause a violent and wide-spread eruption. Be that as it may, however, the Englishman cannot afford, in this instance, to take up the attitude of the critical, but otherwise unconcerned, observer. At home, his knowledge of the coloured man may extend to missionary meetings and occasional lectures from returned explorers; but at a dozen points in the oversea Dominions he is face to face with the elements of the racial problem in divers, and possibly conflicting, forms. Is that problem, with its varying conditions and complexities, to be met and solved, or is it destined to become, as in America, a gigantic and perilous evil? There is already in South Africa, in Australia, in Canada a racial question. Must there necessarily follow, for our kinsmen across the seas, an era of race-riots and mob-law, of recourse to the stake and the gibbet?

We do not know that the history of the negro problem in America has much to teach the Briton in his dealings with the coloured races of the Empire, for it possesses features that render it unique, or nearly so. In no other country, so far as we know, have millions of black men been brought from slavery to political enfranchisement, as it were, at a single step. America is now paying the price of a too swift transition, the serious consequences of which even the sagacity of a LINCOLN could scarcely have foreseen. The negro is now very much in evidence in the Great Republic, he shows every sign of being increasingly so, and thus the problem grows. Indeed the position is such that a well-known American publicist is said to have declared, with a full sense of responsibility, that a settlement could only be arrived at "by murdering the whole negro population or deporting them." The third alternative, that of assimilation of the negro element by means of intermarriage, is, to the average American, unthinkable. Therefore the white citizens of the Great Republic may truly, if regretfully, say that the negro problem (like the poor) threatens to be always with them. Is any British Dominion threatened with a similar impasse? We think not, and for these reasons. In the first place, the Briton at home may look with sympathetic interest upon his "poor black brother;" but when he goes abroad, and comes into direct relation with the coloured races, Exeter-Hall sentiment is laid aside and the requisite "line" is sharply drawn. Nevertheless, his innate sense of justice and his traditions of honest dealing do not forsake him. It is here that the colonizing genius of the Englishman asserts itself: he holds the scales evenly between familiarity and fairplay. Furthermore he profoundly respects, and trusts, "the long arm of British law." Consequently, never in a British Colony has there been suffered to grow up the exasperated conditions of race-hatred and lawlessness which render possible the hounding of a negro to his death at the hands of an infuriated mob. In other words, whether by personal tact or by restrictive legislation, the situation is kept in hand, and no such big and irrevocable step is taken as that which followed in the sequel of the American Civil War. Thus, in Australia no coloured man or woman, however advanced in civilization, is admitted as a settler; in Western Canada the Oriental is similarly excluded, or prohibitively taxed; in South Africa, where the conditions more nearly resemble those of the Southern States, the immigration of Asiatics is forbidden, lest the problem of dealing with the native races already in the country be further complicated. There remains, of course, what may be called the evolutionary aspect of the problem, but little hope of its solution is, we fear, to be gleaned from such considerations, either as regards the United States or any of the British Dominions. Rightly or wrongly, the theory prevails—more as a kind of instinct than as a reasoned principle—that in miscegenation of a white with a coloured race, the former stands to be degraded. Hence that "broad and instinctive feeling against colour inter-marriages" which, as a writer in The Times recently remarked, has probably existed throughout all history, and which "all the philosophical generalizations in the world, all the marshalling of striking exceptions, will not alter." With this sentiment most thinking men will concur; or, if they do not concur, they will at least agree that it is a force to be reckoned with. The conclusion seems inevitable that the evil spirit of racial antagonism can only be exorcised by wise restraint and good Government.

THE AIRSHIP IN PEACE AND WAR.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 29.)

EVENTS of late have been following fast upon one another in the domain of that element which has hitherto been denied to man. Already it may be claimed that aviation has ceased to be a sport, costly and perilous, for it has now definitely entered into the realm of commerce and of war. Not that its progress in either direction has been unmarked by victims—the death-roll, indeed, has been terribly heavy; but such is the price man has to pay for the conquest of the air. The tragic death of the Hon. C. S. ROLLS at Bournemouth, so soon after he had accomplished the feat of crossing and recrossing the Channel in a heavier-than-air machine; the hurling to the ground, from terrible heights, of DÄCHTER and KINET at Rheims, and of that intrepid lady-aeronaut, the Baroness DELAROCHE; the disaster to the German airship Deutschland, which might so easily have ended in a series of fatalities—all these within the past few weeks have served to remind the world that Science has to pay Nature a heavy toll for each advance into the unknown. Nevertheless, there is no hanging-back. Less than four years ago, M. SANTOS-DUMONT achieved the feat of covering 230 yards—the first aerial record. Within the past two weeks one aviator, M. OBESLAGER, covered 245 miles in 203 minutes, and another, M. LABOUCHERE, 211 miles in 277 minutes. The contrast is eloquent of the rapidity of aeronautic progress in recent times. Meanwhile companies have been formed, Germany taking the lead, for the transportation of passengers and goods by means of dirigible airships of the Zeppelin type, and there is even talk, in America, of constructing a vessel of this description for the purpose of crossing the Atlantic. It is recognized that size, in its effect upon buoyancy, is an important adjunct of safety, and as considerations of storage constitute the only serious difficulty on this score, there seems little to prevent further striking development in this direction. The passenger-airship which came to grief recently in Germany was credited with a carrying capacity of twenty tons, apart from the weight of its propelling machinery, and, while further safeguards and improvements will have to be made before the travelling public will trust themselves "on board" a dirigible, the conveyance of light goods by such means should soon prove an easy and profitable undertaking. But the utility of both the two great varieties of air-ship, the buoyant and the heavier-than-air, in warlike operations, whether naval or military, has received immediate recognition, and many types of aerial craft are now in process of construction for the principal Powers. At present the dirigible is a more reliable instrument than the aeroplane, but, on the other hand, it is much more costly. Indeed we have here

OUR LONDON LETTER.

"THE COCOA PRESS."

London, July 2.

The question of the Ethics of Journalism is a modern problem which in its many and various aspects frequently occupies the public mind. The latest development of the subject has been causing a good deal of discussion during the past month. It is the result of the investigation of a series of facts in themselves sufficiently startling and distressing, the conclusion forced upon the unbiassed observer being more melancholy still.

Three journals of note, the National Review, The World, and The Spectator, have joined together in a campaign against what has come to be known as The Cocoa Press. The meaning of this term is explained by a writer in the National Review:

"When the history of British journalism in the twentieth century comes to be written, one of its most interesting chapters will certainly be that devoted to the Cocoa Press. Few of the British public have the slightest idea that three of the leading Radical and Free trade newspapers, the Daily, News Morning Leader and the Star are controlled by cocoa manufacturers. Still fewer are aware that this control in the cocoa interest is exercised in the main by the Cadbury family, well known Quakers, who have made an enormous fortune in the Cocoa Trade and who are understood to be large contributors to the finances of the Radical Party."

The actual figures are as follows. Messrs. Cadbury together with other cocoa magnates, notably members of the Rowntree family, own all the shares in the company controlling the Daily News; they own seventy per cent. of the Morning Leader and seventy per cent. of the Star, an evening paper with a very wide circulation.

Thus it will be seen that the Daily News is entirely controlled by the Cocoa Interest, and that the Morning Leader and the Star are practically and to all intents and purposes also so controlled.

Now of course, there is no reason on earth why either cocoa millionaires or rich Quakers should not own newspapers, or be shareholders in newspaper-owning companies. But it is very important that the public should be aware of the fact. Loudly expressed Free Trade opinions come with a special significance from persons whose fortunes have been made through a protected industry. Furious diatribes against Chinese Labour in the Transvaal have a strange sound upon the lips of those who keep dead silence regarding their own prolonged transactions in the matter of slave grown cocoa from the Portuguese Colonies.

The World and the National Review have dealt with these aspects of the case. Foreseeing the imputation of political motives, or understanding the possibility of extenuating circumstances, the Spectator, with immense moderation, has put them aside and confined itself to a third inconsistency practised by the Cocoa Press, regarding which there can exist not a shadow of uncertainty.

"... Fine professions of purity come very oddly from people who derive profit from circulating betting news. When Messrs. Cadbury took control of the Daily News it was pompously announced that they would 'cleanse Fleet Street.' There is no betting news in the Daily News it is true, but it is guilty at one remove. 'Captain Coe's' betting notes appear daily in the Star, and, we believe, sell that paper largely. Why not Captain Cocoa? Both it and the Morning Leader devote much space to betting and racing. And the Daily News... owns some 9,000 shares in these two journals."

It is a curious situation from every point of view. It is calculated to cause distress and to destroy illusion; at the same time it is not devoid of grimly humorous qualities.

Here are a set of men famous for high religious profession, for excellence of conduct, for a wide philanthropy, strict morality, for a thousand generousities and a thousand charities. Thus they stand revealed to the world through their public acts and through the pages of their organ the Daily News. Through the Star which is equally under their control they seem to countenance an unbalanced, untruthful, violent and vulgar form of journalism, selling betting news and continually inciting their fellow countrymen to an insidious and ruinous form of gambling, a form of gambling connected with all that is lowest and dirtiest in our national life, which leads to the deterioration of character and of virtue.

Arraigned before the tribunal of the public mind upon this shameful indictment, the masters of the Cocoa Press maintain absolute silence. It is easy to believe that they have nothing to say.

Not so a host of their sympathisers. Documents from all sorts of people, including journalists, socialists and "men of the world" have flooded the pages of the Spectator. There has been a good deal of empty invective and a quantity of arguments of which the following are a few selected at haphazard.

It has been said that much of the profits of the Star company have been devoted to charitable purposes. It has been said that the Star is no shameful exception, that the vast majority of newspapers publish betting tips. It has been said that if Messrs. Cadbury and their friends abandoned the Star, it would continue to publish betting tips, and that things would be in no way improved. It has been said that the Star depends for its circulation upon its betting tips, that without them it would cease to exist. It has also been said that the owners of the Star intend to abolish its betting news at an early date.

These statements are really beside the mark. There is no room for any misconception. Nothing can be made of the case because the facts speak too plainly for themselves. "Let not your right hand know what your left hand doeth" is the command, and Messrs. Cadbury and Rowntree have been busy putting a very strange interpretation upon it. There is no doubt that these are really good men, but they have been utterly blinded by their self-righteousness, cooped up within the narrow limits of their pious self conceit. They have shown to the world the power of cant, and bred a deep distrust of all who make philanthropic professions.

THE "STRAND'S" TRANSGRESSION.

The Strand Magazine for the month of June is guilty of a transgression against Journalistic Ethics, but the error into which it has fallen is different in nature from the practices of the Cocoa Press. The Strand contains an article entitled The Assassination of Plehve by one of the Assassins; with the following note or foreword:

"The narrative which we are here enabled to set before our readers is unique and sensational in the highest degree. For the first time the secrets of the Russian Revolutionary Party—the aims, methods and characters of the terrible 'Fighting Organization'—are revealed to the public by one of their own body. It is a real 'human document' throwing a flood of light upon the inner history of one of the most sensational assassinations ever planned. It is difficult after reading it to avoid the reflection that these men and women, perpetrators though they were of what is commonly regarded as the vilest kind of murder, have something in them of the stuff of which, in better causes, heroes and martyrs are made."

Of course it is in the light of heroes and martyrs that these murderers, or dangerous lunatics, call them which you please, are presented. Here is the description of Sazonoff, an anarchist, who threw the bomb that killed Plehve.

"Sazonoff was young, healthy and strong. The force of young life emanated from his sparkling eyes and ruddy cheeks... he believed in success and expected it. He also regarded terroristic work above all as a personal sacrifice, as martyrdom. But he accepted this martyrdom gladly and calmly as though he gave it no thought, just as he never thought of Plehve. He was a revolutionary of the old 'will of the People' type and knew neither doubt nor hesitation."

Besides this dangerous person may be placed the two women of the community.

"Narovo had spent her hard life in prison and exile. Her pale wrinkled old face was lit up by clear kind maternal eyes. All the members of the organization were, so to say, her children. She loved them all alike with a steady, gentle warm love."

Dora Brilliant, "the silent timid modest Dora, lived solely by her faith in the Terror. She loved the Revolution, grieved at its failures and while recognising the necessity of killing Plehve, feared this assassination. She could not reconcile herself to bloodshed; it was easier for her to die than to kill, and yet her perpetual prayer was that she might be allowed to throw one of the bombs."

There is no doubt that this article has proved to be very good copy for the Strand Magazine. Indeed the numbers for the month of June have gone off like hot cakes. All the same it is very pernicious stuff, and its publication makes for the wide spreading of ideas which are incorrect, undesirable, and dangerous. It encourages a morbid temper, at present only too common, together with the spirit of discontent and revolt which are fast becoming the nation's bane. Nor is this all, though perhaps it is the worst. Considering the relations of this country with the Empire of Russia, the publication of such an article as the Assassination of Plehve, prefixed merely in the bland and light-hearted note quoted above, shows a regrettable lack of tact, and a fault in taste both irritating and foolish. In the third place the insertion of the article is to be condemned from a purely moral point of view. The action will tend to increase the extraordinary confusion and the reversing of values, which is inculcated by so much of the literature of to-day. It is now the villainous fashion to say that black is white and that white is black, or worse still that there is no black and no white, but only a dirty sort of grey. It is wrong and dangerous to enlist the sympathies of a guileless public upon the side of the perpetrators of a foul murder, and to give the impression that the murderers are of the stuff whereof heroes, and martyrs are made.

"A JAPANESE ARTIST IN LONDON."

A good deal of interest has been aroused by Yoshio Markino's book, A Japanese Artist in London. It is introduced to the public as follows:—

"The force and irresistible humour of Yoshio Markino's writing are already well known; for his Prefaces to 'The Colour of London,' 'The Colour of Paris' and 'The Colour of Rome,' (all of which he illustrated)," have attracted wide attention by their peculiar and engaging qualities. In his new volume, A Japanese Artist in London, Mr. Markino (one wonders a little, by the way, at the "r" which he has put into his name) reveals afresh that astonishing blend of natural gaiety and philosophic shrewdness which delighted the readers of his Prefaces."

Mr. Douglas Sladen begins the book with an "Appreciation" of the author's literary style and personal character. The former he compares in certain particulars to that of Carlyle; the latter he rates as highly as possible.

"Mr. Markino," he writes, "has as white a soul as ever entered human body. He is absolutely candid and entirely without false shame. Yoshio Markino is more like a spirit than most of the spirits clothed in flesh which we call human beings."

The book is written with very considerable talent. Its author has a gift of humour, a knowledge of human nature, a charm of style which makes his work eminently readable and amusing.

Mr. Markino came to London from America, where his experience had been exceedingly unpleasant. The attitude of Londoners was a delightful change. The author records his first sight-seeing experience in one of the public parks which he had timidly entered.

"Nobody shouted me. Then I went near the crowds of people with still more fear. Being quite ignorant of the English civilization I anticipated some pebble showers every minute. I waited and waited with beating heart, but nothing happened to me at all. I walked into the crowds who were feeding birds in the lake of St. James' Park; nobody spat on me! I ventured myself into the thickest crowds and I was squeezed between the peoples. Nobody took any notice of me. 'Hallo, hallo, what's matter? I said in my heart. 'Perhaps they don't know I am a Japanese' I took off my hat on purpose to show my black hair. Finally, one man pushed me quite accidentally, and he touched his hand to his hat and apologised to me very politely. I realised at last I was in a country where I could enjoy my liberty quite freely."

Mr. Markino has nothing but good to say of that often maligned person, the English Landlady. It is refreshing to hear of the many kindnesses that he received from the members of the poor families where he lodged, of the sympathy which existed between them and him. His description of his friendship with "Elsie" and "Winnie" the two little Greenwich girls is particularly charming.

"On Saturdays . . . I used to buy oranges or apples at Charing Cross Station, and put them in my pockets. They (the children) were always waiting me at the Maze Hill Station. They often waited two or three hours there when I was too busy at the office. Soon as I got off the train they would search all my pockets and find out "something." Then they were so happy. I used to carry Winnie on my back while Elsie pulled my coat to guide me to home. If I had an early afternoon, I used to take them to London to see Zoo, Parks or some Music Hall. They were too frightened of traffics to cross the road. I used to carry them in my arms, one each time, to the other side."

The chapter entitled Japanese Impressions of London, which is in the nature of a Symposium conducted by Mr. Markino and his Japanese friends; should prove instructive and teach us a little to see ourselves as others see us.

"I say Markino, don't you feel it is more like a shop than a drawing room when you go to the English house? They put all their properties in their drawing rooms."

"I love both ways, Japanese as well as English. It is only different taste, that is all. Certainly it is very artistic taste to have only one genuine Kakemono on the Tokonoma, and it concentrates all our eyes there. It gives me a very pleasant feeling. But on the other hand, I don't object the English idea at all. When they are arranged beautifully it is awfully nice....."

When a book is so undeniably amusing, so breezy and so original as Mr. Markino's, it seems ungracious to suggest that upon the whole it is disappointing.

As a subtle study of the artistic temperament, it is certainly beyond all praise. But there is something in its tone, in the flourish with which it is put before the public, and in its manner of reception by that public, which cannot but jar upon all true lovers of Japan. Charm and a most engaging frankness have been attained only at a real sacrifice of dignity. Mr. Markino is exceedingly direct; does that prove that he is entirely sincere? For one who knows ever so little of actual circumstances there seems to be so much between the lines and behind the scenes of his book. For what is unconvincing, Mr. Markino's English friends are doubtless largely responsible. They admire his silence and secrecy under privation and suffering, and immediately induce him to describe his experiences in a book, which apparently he is not loath to do, and does with a complete lack of reserve. The recital of all this delights and entertains a fickle English public; Mr. Markino's name is in every mouth.

Perhaps it may not be equally delightful and entertaining to the efficient officials who work in London for the comfort and protection of their fellow Japanese.

Probably they learned that Mr. Markino was somewhat hard to help. It would appear upon his own showing that his periods of dire poverty were interspersed with periods of a somewhat lively prosperity. What of the seven bottles of saké (or was it nine?) consumed at a sitting?

But, after all carping is unprofitable. The book as has been said, is a study of the artistic temperament; if it be at all touched with charlatanism, the charlatanism is delightful. To say any more would be to open up the old unsolved question of artistic sincerity in autobiographical literature.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

OPINION ON THE CONVENTION.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

St. Petersburg, July 7.

The Russo-Japanese Convention was signed on Monday by M. Izvolsky and Baron Motono and will be officially published early next week. I am enabled to give from an authoritative source the following details of this important instrument.

The Convention is a brief document of about a dozen lines of text and consists of a preamble and three articles. The Preamble refers to previous instruments between the two Powers, in particular the agreement of July 1907, and goes on to say that being mutually desirous of assisting in the facilitation of the through traffic of the world for commercial and economic purposes the two Powers have executed the following Convention. Art. 1. Russia and Japan, the two Powers possessing railways in Manchuria, agree to render mutual assistance and friendly offices in everyway that may be conducive to the better exploitation of these railways, and further undertake to refrain from any form of competition between the lines belonging to the two contracting parties. Art. 2. The contracting parties agree to maintain the status quo now existing in Manchuria as defined by various treaties etc. covering this region. Art. 3. In the event of anything occurring to threaten the continued existence of the present status in this region, the contracting parties agree to confer together on the measures to be taken to maintain the status quo.

It will be noted that there is no reference in this Convention to Mongolia, and statements made in certain quarters to that effect are erroneous. In general the text of the Convention reminds the reader of the Declaration of 1908 signed by Russia, Denmark and Germany concerning the status of the Baltic Sea.

I have had the advantage to-day of hearing from a highly placed official, whose information on the subject is first-hand, the following remarks upon the Convention and cognate questions. He said: "This Convention merely puts on record the situation which has been arrived at in the course of friendly negotiations between Japan and Russia. Japan is satisfied that we have no intention of undertaking a revanche: we are satisfied that Japan does not desire to extend her acquisitions any further. Each of us, however, is determined to maintain what each has gained. Our interests are therefore identical in Manchuria, and this instrument is the outcome of our joint desire to maintain the status quo now existing according to treaties and agreements—of Russia with Japan, and of both Powers with China—regulating the status of this part of the world. The Convention is not aimed at anybody else and merely secures the continuance of tranquillity and peace. It was, of course, communicated to the allies of the two contracting parties, France and England, and it may be taken as another guarantee of the peace of the world. You ask about the American proposals of Mr. Knox. We considered that we had a right to be consulted, if not first, at any rate not last, on the proposition to neutralise Manchurian railways. We have received assurances from the United States that they do not seek any political objects but are interested only in commercial and economic problems in this part of the world. From the Russian point of view, however, the line proposed from Chinchow to Aigun has no economic value whatever unless it be joined up to the Russian Manchurian line. This we could not, of course, allow: it threatens us politically and strategically not only in Manchuria but conceivably also north of the Amur River in Russian territory. We sympathise with China's aspirations after economic development, but we cannot recognise the economic value to China of this line unless it had a junction with our line. Moreover we do not understand China's alleged eagerness to build precisely in this direction, for she has by treaty the right of purchase of our Manchurian line in 35 years and in 70 years it will become hers without purchase. It is therefore not clear to us why China desires to expend money on a new railway precisely in this corner of her territory. We have consented to her building a line from Pekin via Kalgan and Urga to join our Great Siberian line east of Lake Baykal. Even this is not at all in the interests of Russia, but we are willing to make some concession to our friendship with China in this matter."

The Convention is welcomed by the Russian Press. The Novoe Vremya concludes a long article by gracefully acknowledging that its trenchant criticisms of M. Izvolsky's conduct of the Russian Foreign Office have been heavily discounted by the conclusion of this Convention.

The spy-case of Baron Ungern-Sternberg, a Russian subject, and correspondent of various Austrian and German papers and agencies, and also of the Daily Mail, resulted in a domiciliary perquisition at the house of Reuter's Correspondent in St. Petersburg, who has been implicated by the Baron's confessions. Eight men invaded the Englishman's flat and carried off everything with writing on it, including all private and home letters. The Correspondent was examined before the judicial investigators yesterday and subsequently left by boat for London. It is believed by those who know Reuter's representative here that the Baron may have preferred to give up his name rather than that of another representative of an English paper with whom he was on very intimate and close relations both socially and professionally.

The failure of the coal combine "Produgol" (=Coalsel) is reported to have been followed by a vigorous movement on the part of German agents in buying up cheaply all the mines and properties that are falling into the market consequent on the smash of the combine and the depressed condition of mining in South Russia.

A girl has just been sentenced to 20 years' penal servitude at Pskov for having participated, dressed in man's clothes, with a body of desperadoes in the sacking of a monastery some years ago during which several monks were killed. She will now be tried once more on a series of similar charges relating to another part of the country. Her fellow-expropriators were dealt with at the time but the girl showed signs of mental failure and was put back until she fully recovered.

Over 2000 cases of cholera have been registered at Rostov-on-Don, and in other towns of South Russia the epidemic is very serious indeed. From various centres come the usual stories of doctors and men-nurses from the hospitals being subjected to rough handling by crowds of ignorant muzhiks, who say and believe that cholera is an invention of the learned because "doctors must live!"

An over-zealous steward of an estate in the Province of Samara finding a number of village women trespassing on his fields rounded up eleven of them and imprisoned them in the "pound" like cattle. They were only released on payment of a ransom by their respective husbands, some of whom took all night to make up the sum demanded, which was only sevenpence halfpenny!

Cholera is reported to have broken out at Ardebil in Persia, twenty cases and six deaths having occurred to date.

KARUIZAWA NOTES.

On reading the column under the above caption in a local journal, I greatly hesitated to cast in my lot with those exposed to the round of dissipation therein threatened; but now that the venture has been made, I find that, like the usual society column, the threat was greatly exaggerated, and life is here not nearly so frivolous as the said journal's readers might anticipate.

Everybody seems to be here in the same old way. Stroll up and down the main thoroughfare of the village about four or five o'clock in the afternoon, when most of the female portion of the community may be expected to be on view, and the same old faces with the same old looks, followed by the same old children (always a little older) attended by the same old husbands, all in the same old styles, grace the various rendez-vous of the hamlet in the same old way. In fact Karuizawa is much as it used to be, which will be information for the uninitiated. A strange face cropping up here and there but lends emphasis to the rule that in this famous resort all things continue as they have been from time past. Even Asama is no exception to this statement, despite the alarming reports which we read in certain newspapers. The soul of the crater does grumble a bit now and then, probably in sympathy with the congestion of the district at this season, but the old mountain looks just the same old way.

On Monday there took place the same old weekly concert in the same old way. This repetition of emphasis on repetition I trust will not be misunderstood as casting any reflection on the tendency. It is only natural that good people should be the same and act in the same old way. Even that they should be able to look in the same old way, despite advancing years, is something they can be grateful for. Well, the weekly concert began, continued, and ended in the same old way, which, for the benefit of strangers, I may say, was not a bad way; and as for old frequenters of the place, it will be sufficient for them to hear that it was the same. The famous but tedious five minutes' intermission for digestion of grace received were utilized in the same old way; for the same old gentlemen went forth to greet the same old ladies in the same old manner, and I presume indulged in the same old jokes and greetings. A new and decided addition to the same old artists was a Miss Artzet, a lady of excellent talent and execution. She was ably assisted by the Misses Landis, and Miss Laning gave some interesting recitations to vary the situation. The first of these described the same old object in the same old way; which was quite in harmony with Karuizawa precedent, for there is probably no place in Japan more given to engagements than the same old Karuizawa. Indeed when one looks back over the last ten years and considers how much this little nook has done to carry out the Rooseveltian command to increase and replenish the earth, the most that one can hope is that the spiritual increase will be equal to the natural.

Sometimes when I gaze upon these seven or eight hundred men and women, all in this country for the purpose of teaching the Japanese a truth they believe will promote the happiness and welfare of the nation, and when I think of the immense sum of money invested by the English and American people for this purely philanthropic purpose, and for the sake of Japan in the best sense of the word, I wonder what the Japanese really think of it all. Because the Japanese are not like other non-Christian peoples; they are a highly civilized nation of fine instincts, and, therefore, capable of appreciating a courtesy offered or a benefit conferred. Do the Japanese adequately realize the immense amount of money and educated human character and life that England and America have handed over to them as a free gift for purely moral and educative purposes? This is a delicate subject, and one that only an outsider could mention; but I believe that all the more thoughtful of the people of the Empire are duly appreciative of what Japan owes to the good offices of the foreign missionary.

The railway authorities at Karuizawa are behind time in the same old way. What I mean is that when the Department of Railways decided to build a new station at this resort the structure should have been completed before the arrival of the summer visitors. As it is, everything is in a half-finished condition, with piles of lumber lying here and there, all the usual offices changed, and everything in a mess. All this could have been as easily attended to a month ago as it is now; and how different would be the impression left upon the public. The Karuizawa post office is doing the same old business in the same old way. The postmaster is neither bigger nor smaller, the delivery neither earlier nor later than usual, and the old clock is on the same old key.

The population appears to be building new houses in the wonted manner. Five or six new ones are already completed this year and others are under contemplation. But the same old styles obtain in the same old way. When Solomon said there was nothing new under the sun he was supposed to be labouring under a bit of self-satiated monotony; but he was nearer right than his critics; for does not the tree grow in the same old style; and fine food and good company appeal to us in the same old way? But even into so select a place as Karuizawa innovation is said sometimes to creep, though it finally die for want of patronage; but there are one or two tailors of lady persuasion who may be said to have succeeded with some difficulty in not making female attire in exactly the same old way. Whether it be an innovation or a mistake must be left to the public to decide.

The old notice board contains the same old notices in the same old chirography, dilating on the same old themes. Mrs. Stout wants to sell a bed that doesn't quite fit; while Mr. Skip hurt his ankle and will dispose of his matchless racquet at an enormous reduction on import cost. Mrs. Synthy has two or three cooks she would (thoughtfully) like to find places for, hoping never to hear from them again; and Mrs. Jolly's baby has outgrown the sweetest baby-carriage ever bowled by a hubby. The same old notice about the same old house in the same old Grove is still there, and the house is for the same old rent in the same old way. The same old fish-monger has the same old fish, origin unknown, at the same old price; and Willie Kidkin has found a hat pin, which he will convey by legal process to the legal owner upon the usual conditions. Those wishing to go on picnics will send notice to the proper authorities and chaperons will be provided.

The Japan Mail is being congratulated on all sides by Karuizawa readers for the excellent reports of the Edinburgh Missionary Conference appearing in its columns. "SEMPER IDEM."

CHRISTIANITY IN JAPAN.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

The work of Protestant Missions in Japan is furnishing a new test of the truth and power of the Gospel. Never have such conditions existed before, and obstacles of the same character and strength. In a "Report on the Evangelization of Japan: A study in Conditions, Principles and Policies," which was presented at the World's Missionary Conference at Edinburgh by Mr. Galen M. Fisher, he says, "Rarely, if ever before in her history has the Church attempted to Christianize a people so advanced at once in intellectual, moral and material culture as the Japanese. A people in whom the spirit of progress rests upon so deep a substratum of conservatism cannot be shaken loose in a day. The expectations entertained twenty years ago that they would be swept into Christianity en masse have given place to the realization that the Christianization of the Empire is a task of generations."

But in spite of all hindrances the work is growing year by year, and the outlook to-day is indeed hopeful. From the statistics which have just been compiled for the new issue of "The Christian Movement in Japan" we learn that there were 6,285 adult baptisms reported during the past year, and the present Church Membership is 76,249. There are now 563 Ordained Ministers, and 603 unordained Ministers and Helpers. Of the 543 fully organized Churches 172 are self supporting. The total contributions last year were yen 269,343; which is an increase of nearly 10,000 over the preceding year.

These figures are not large; and for various reasons. In the first place it is impossible to make them complete. Then the Christians are, as a class, more ambitious and enterprising than the ordinary people, and a much larger per cent. of them will be found among the emigrants to other countries where native churches are being very generally established. The Japanese are also accustomed to frequent change of residence; and so, as they leave for some other part of the country, their names are dropped from the roll. Some find churches at their new locations with which they unite, but a considerable number do not; and so they are no longer counted in the returns.

Another cause is that each church is assessed according to its reported membership for the support of denominational causes; and it is therefore desirable that none but actual members should be counted, as it would otherwise necessitate the payment of more than their proper proportion by the others.

Then too there are unorganized groups of Christians, and individual believers all over the land whose names do not appear on the rolls of any of the churches. Each year there is an increasingly large number of those who accept Christ as their Master and the Bible as their guide who are not connected with any of the churches. If all such were known and counted, the number would be far in excess of what is now reported.

There is another feature of this work that marks it as peculiar, and it is of special interest. In a "Report of a Visit to China, Japan and Korea," by Rev. Arthur J. Brown, D.D. (one of the Secretaries of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions), he says, "The influence of Christianity is far greater than the given figures would indicate. In most countries Christianity made its first converts among the lower strata of society; but in Japan it has won its greatest success among the Samurai or knightly class. This is the class which has furnished the majority of the army and navy officers, journalists, legislators, educators, and leading men generally of the new Japan. It can readily be understood, therefore, that the Japanese churches have a strength out of all proportion to their numbers.

"But there are notable evidences of Christian influence which can not be tabulated in statistical tables. Seven years ago, the pupils of the Government schools in a certain city were not allowed to attend Sunday School. Now they are not only free to attend, but six of the teachers are Christians, and four of them teach in the Sunday School. In another Government School, of the five students who stood at the head of the graduating class, four were Christians. The Principal reported that fourteen other students gave 'no religion' in response to his inquiries, but stated that they were inquirers. The missionary asked the Principal what they were inquirers of, and he replied, Christianity."

Then again the past year has been to some extent a period of transition. For some years past the questions of administration, of the relation of the missionaries to the native churches and the place which the Japanese pastors were to occupy have had a large prominence in the minds of all connected with the work; while other, and the real work of evangelization has suffered. In some of the churches the question of independence and self-support has been so prominent as to occupy the thoughts of the pastor and members to the exclusion of almost everything else. All these questions are being gradually adjusted, and both Japanese preachers and missionaries are settling down to the steady and definite work of evangelization. In an address by Rev Mr. Uyemura at the Semicentennial Conference at Tokyo he spoke with great earnestness of the need of a change in the preaching, and that more emphasis should be given to the presentation of the claims of Christianity and its adaptation to meet the needs of men. The salvation of souls is more important than self-support or freedom from foreign control.

It is a matter for rejoicing that at this early stage of the church in Japan there has been raised up a native ministry so capable and so truly consecrated to their work. Of what Dr. Brown saw during his visit he writes, "The more I see of the Christians of Asia, the more I respect and love them. I expected to find intelligence and earnestness in the Japanese leaders, for I knew the social and intellectual strata from which most of them come. They manifest a fidelity and courage and loving devotion to Christ which deeply move me. If, as Amiel says, the test of every religious, political or educational system is the man which it forms, Christianity is meeting the test in Asia. These men are doing, to say the least, quite as well as any of us would do in similar circumstances. Let us honor them and trust them. Let us no longer call them our agents or helpers but our co-workers and friends."

Writing upon the same subject Rev. Dr. Greene says, "It is only just that we should recognize, as we most joyfully do, the maturity of faith, the ripeness of experience and the fitness for leadership of our Japanese associates. Within our individual spheres we may be fitted to serve as experts in the furtherance of Christian work; but the responsibility of leadership is theirs, and it is a joy to know that this responsibility has fallen upon men so worthy of the confident loyalty of their Christian countrymen."

For many years there has been a discussion as to whether the missionary force in Japan should be increased or the work left to the Japanese Christians; and good men have differed in their views on this subject.

But the question is no longer a matter of doubt in the minds of those who properly understand the situation; and it is now a matter of deciding how many new missionaries are needed, or can be supplied in order to meet the present and prospective requirements for the proper continuance of the work.

Speaking upon this point, Rev. Mr. Makino says, "We are very few; we feel our ranks are very thin. You may say that new missionaries require time to become well prepared. More time is necessary to raise us up native Ministers. At least ten years are needed for use to become efficient Ministers, after we have given proof that we are thoroughly converted, and that we are good Christians. You are teachers. You must be conscious that we need you especially for this purpose. How can we teach all these new members?"

Dr. Brown says in his Report, "The leaders of the Church of Christ frankly told me that they needed the help of their brethren in Europe and America. They stated that while large reinforcements were not required, the present foreign force is too small." Mr. Fisher reports that, "Both Japanese and missionary leaders, so far as interviewed, are almost unanimous in believing that the missionary force should be increased. Bishop Honda favours doubling it. A conservative consensus of opinion would call for an increase of 25 per cent., and all are agreed that this increase should take place within the next ten years."

Much has been said and written as to the kind of Christianity that is needed for Japan, and some have the idea that a new form of doctrine must be devised to meet the peculiar demands of this people. But experience shows that it is those churches which maintain the essentials of the accepted doctrines of the evangelical Christianity that are making real progress, or have any vitalizing power. In the address of Rev. Mr. Makino he says, "Not discussion not theory, but positive truth must be taught; such as can only spring from spiritual experiences of Christian nurture. Life can be inspired by life only."

Some years ago the question arose in connection with the work of the Y.M.C.A. as to whether Unitarians should be recognized as eligible to active membership in that organization. Mr. John R. Mott was present at the discussion and insisted upon an orthodox basis for membership, and that was adopted. Subsequent events have shown the wisdom of such action, as the success of the Y.M.C.A. has been phenomenal, and in marked contrast with the results of so called "Liberal Christianity."

"One weakness of the Christian movement," says Mr. Fisher, "is the fact that the majority of the members of the city churches are not drawn from the permanent old residents. It should be said however, that the new-comers are generally free from social opposition and consequently easier to approach; like all pioneers, they are apt to be enterprising; and hence, when once won, make active workers."

"Japanese youths respond readily to the idealistic appeal of Christianity, but their faith generally lacks the subsoil of early Christian nurture, in which the emotions and the will are rooted secure from surface disturbances; so that when doubt or the seductions of money-making, or the frowns of superiors assail them, their faith, not seldom, is blasted, and they are added to the roll of "graduate Christians," a burden and a reproach to the Church. Yet when all discounts have been made, there are left such vigour and loyalty, such masculine valour and feminine sensitiveness as have already given the world fresh and beautiful types of Christian character."

"The work of the past fifty years has included all phases, although the industrial has been insignificant and the medical has steadily decreased. Emphasis from the first has been placed upon education, preaching and women's work. Children's work in Sunday-schools and kindergartens has been extensively carried on and has been very fruitful. The exceptional intelligence of the Japanese Christian workers is largely accounted for by the early attention paid to education. This attention was due both to the foresight of the missionaries and to the thirst for instruction on the part of the intelligent middle class of Samurai descent."

"The surest ground of hope for the comparatively early Christianization of a considerable proportion of the people is the fact that within a generation of the founding of the first church, Christianity has become naturalized, has given birth to leaders comparable in character and ability to those of the West, and has created several aggressive self-governing bodies."

In summing up the whole results of his journey Dr. Brown concludes; "I am inspired by a stronger confidence in the vitality of the Gospel, a more assured conviction that amid the tumult of a changing order, the purpose of the omnipotent and ever-living God is being steadily developed. If all Churches in Europe and America will address themselves to the world-wide opportunities of the age, the next decade may decisively affect the spiritual destinies of the whole non-Christian world."

"God is working His purpose out as year succeeds to year;
God is working His purpose out, and the time is drawing near Nearer and nearer draws the time, the time that shall surely be,
When the earth shall be filled with the glory of God as the waters cover the sea."

ACCORDING to the statistics published by the Tobacco Monopoly Bureau, the total value of the tobacco sold during the month of June was 3,978,000 yen, in cigarettes, and 524,200 yen in cut tobacco. The accumulated figures for the three months April, May and June, are 17,209,340 yen, which shows an increase of 504,583 yen, as compared with the corresponding period of last year.

the case of the battleship and the torpedo-boat over again. It has been argued by one school of naval experts that as forty torpedo-boats can be built for the cost of a single battleship, the wisest policy, as well as the most economical, is to construct a great number of these mosquito-craft, rather than a few battleships, any one of which might, with good fortune, be sent to the bottom by one well-aimed blow from the deadly torpedo. Nevertheless, battleships continue to be built, and to form the criterion of naval power. So, in the warfare of the air, the dirigible will be pitted against the aeroplane, with the advantage of size on the one side and of numbers on the other. So far the balloon-type has the advantage in one respect—it can rise to greater heights than the aeroplane. Even this superiority, however, threatens to be short-lived, for the aviator DREXEL, in a flight at the recent Bournemouth meeting, rose to a height of 2,500 feet. Some experts hold that the day of the dirigible will be over when the aeroplane can rise above it, for not only does the gas-bag of the former get in its own way, as far as firing at the enemy is concerned, but it is liable to swift destruction by explosives dropped upon it by the aeroplane. To meet this danger, a dirigible has already been designed by a German firm with a gun-platform on top of the gas-bag, and connected with the lower parts of the ship by means of a spiral staircase through the gas-bag itself. Again, the inflammable nature of the gas with which the balloon is inflated—hydrogen is usually employed—constitutes a dangerous weakness from which the aeroplane is free. The latter, too, presents a small and infinitely less vulnerable target. In fact, the capacity of the aeroplane for scouting purposes seems to be already established; and that its possibilities do not end there may be inferred from experiments recently carried out by Mr. CURTISS, the American aviator, against a target representing a battleship, which he speedily destroyed by means of high explosive bombs dropped from a given height. It is clear that the destructive capabilities of the airship in this respect, while rendering it a formidable adjunct to the panoply of war, must certainly, and at no distant date, effect a revolution in the design of warships. Threatened below the surface by the torpedo and the submarine, the naval constructor of the future will, at the same time, be called upon to devise means of protection from aerial attack; and he will be required also to perform that most difficult of feats, the designing of a gun that can be effectively used against an enemy overhead. In view of these circumstances, is it too confident a prediction to make that, in a very few years, the rapid development of the airship and the submarine will render battleships and cruisers a thing of past?

THE BOOKSHELF.

Peace or War East of Baikal? by E. J. HARRISON. Messrs. Kelly & Walsh, Yokohama.

A SITUATION of great interest exists to-day in East Asia. It is a situation with definitely fixed limits and indefinite potentialities. If the conventional restrictions be observed, the outcome ought to be peaceful. If they be not observed, the map of the world may be tumultuously changed. Some publicists hold that the letter of the treaties will be adhered to. Others hold that the thing is impossible. The former take the view that the issues at stake are too large, too momentous, to be paltered with, and that the dangers involved in any breach of the international compacts formed during the past 5 years will ensure obedience. The latter are persuaded that those compacts contain in themselves elements fatal to observance. In other words, the second class of thinkers are convinced that the compacts, when the time for terminating them arrives, will be found to have begotten material interests too stupendous to be sacrificed on any altar of international ethics. That is the problem which Mr. Harrison has proposed to himself for solution in the volume now before us. As to the spirit in which he has approached his task, the following extract from his preface is instructive:—

In political controversy some may aspire to impartiality but few achieve it, and perhaps I am no more fortunate than the majority in this respect. I have at least done my best. I trust, too, that the context will make it abundantly clear that I by no means share the belief of many publicists in the sinister and warlike preparations of Japan for an epic effort to win the hegemony of East Asia. The fact that the scaremongers in Russia are convinced that Russia is Japan's prospective foe, and that the same gentry in America are equally certain that for Russia we must read the United States, should be sufficient to demonstrate the unstable foundation upon which all such sweeping conclusions must necessarily rest. In any event it seems unfair to censure Japan for faithfully following the example of every other first-class Power in the world to-day. If in this respect her post-bellum actions may impress political purists as incompatible with the higher ethics and the behests of the categorical imperative, she is at any rate sinning in good company. For the rest her statesmen have left no stone unturned to prove that their aims are essentially defensive, not offensive; nor will any unprejudiced onlooker blame Japan for declining to commit her destinies on the mainland to the efficacy of sweet reasonableness, in preference to more lethal arguments. So far, be it noted, no single Power has had the temerity to accuse Japan of failure to live up to the principle of the open-door and equal opportunity in Manchuria, and this being the case, it is unreasonable to expect the Government of the country to be for ever controverting what from its point of view can only be characterized as the conscious or unconscious misrepresentations of private individuals. As a national partisan one may do everything in one's power to retard Japanese progress on the continent, but as a cosmopolitan with no personal axe to grind, one must perforce admit that the sum-total of Japanese foreign policy is perfectly normal and, judged by international standards set by the Powers long before Japan won a place for herself in their comity, perfectly legitimate. As an admirer of both Japan and Russia I rejoice over the rapprochement which has set in between the two erstwhile foes, and the evolution of a more enduring and specific compact in the near future would appeal to me as a very natural consummation in view of the identity of their interests on the mainland.

Whether Mr. Harrison has succeeded in maintaining this attitude of impartiality throughout, we do not propose to discuss here. It is enough to say that if he had maintained it, his work would not be as interesting as it is, for an evenly-held scale is, after all, a comparatively tame affair.

And his book is very interesting. He does not by any means confine himself to political disquisitions. On the contrary, these are largely subordinated to topographical and ethnographical descriptions which are at once picturesque and instructive. He seems to have a good working knowledge of the Russian and the Japanese languages, and every one of his twenty-three chapters holds attention and embodies valuable information. His style, too, though sometimes aggressive, is incisive and lucid, and altogether we regard his work as a highly valuable addition to the library of the Far East. He is an avowed admirer of Millard, of Straight, of Cloud, of Bethell, of McKenzie, of Hulbert and of Young, yet we venture to think that his mind is cast in a more impartial mould than is the mind of any of these seven publicists. It should be added that there is an appendix containing the text of several important treaties, and that some valuable maps are added.

Studies in the Decorative Art of Japan, by Sir FRANCIS PIGGOTT, Chief Justice of Hongkong. Yokohama, Kelly & Walsh, Limited.

THIS is a unique work and will remain unique. The decorative art of Japan has already inspired essays. Its beauties and its novelties could not fail to attract attention. But everything hitherto written about it has been of a cursory, fugitive character. No one has attempted to analyse it. Sir Francis Piggott is the first to treat it in that manner. Himself an artist of no mean skill, he devoted much time during his sojourn in Japan to studying typical examples of the country's decorative art amid the entourage for which they were designed, and by copying them with his own hand, he arrived at an intimate knowledge of their elements and their composition. The results of his labour of love are now given to the world in seven chapters, entitled "The Art of Temples;" "The Decoration of Flat surfaces;" "Wave and Cloud Forms;" "Lattice Work;" "The Decoration of the Japanese;" "The Use of the Circular Form;" "The Pakwa Diapers and the Key Borders." There are a multitude of illustrations, always apt and enlightening, and always finely executed, some in colour, some in sepia. Indeed we hasten to say that the printing establishment—the Box of Curios—where the work was produced has done honour to Yokohama, as has also the enterprise of the publishers, Messrs. Kelly and Walsh. We quote here one or two typical passages of this illuminating work:—

I now turn to the purely conventional ornament of the Japanese. There is in it, as in the decoration of all countries, a broad division between conventional and naturalistic treatment of its subjects; but it is, I think, more sharply marked here than in any other art. Language in its art department is terribly poor, and writers are driven to invent terms, which, as often as not, till their meaning is grasped, seem to be in direct survival from the first confusion of speech. But the two expressions, "natural conventionalism" and "conventional naturalism," do, I think, convey a definite meaning. By natural conventionalism will be understood the conventional treatment of natural forms. The term serves to mark designs which base their form on nature, and to distinguish them from pure line ornament—"geometrical design" as it is sometimes called: "arabesques," and all which is "line for line's sake," and not convention at all. But in conventional naturalism the form of the flower or leaf, which are its most common subjects, is preserved; the treatment only is conventional. It is "form for form's sake"; and it is in this branch of decorative art that the Japanese so greatly excel.

The great lesson which this series, and every design of the series, teaches, is much needed by western artists. It is not merely the graceful flow of line which charms and holds us, but even more the subtle distribution of the masses of colour and space, and consequent repose to the eye; and this in spite of an inequality which is very perceptible, and a certain touch of the hap-hazard. This, the greatest virtue which designing can possess, is I believe, purely Japanese; for I can find but little trace of it even in the work of the Chinese.

The position which blank space holds in the art of the Japanese is responsible for one of its most subtle and attractive qualities. In their pictures there are great spaces without so much as a line or faint wash of colour. They are not "wasted," as we should think, and sometimes say: they take their share in the general effect, as any one may prove to his dissatisfaction, if he cut off the blank space from one of his pictures. So it is in these designs. There is in all of them a mysterious sense of proportion of colour to space, never the same, in which the eye delights as much as it does in the delicate tracery of the design itself.

These extracts convey an idea of the author's deep insight into his subject. They do more: They reveal a style which is in itself high art; a style which carries us along from cover to cover, and is of the finest without any visible suggestion of striving to be fine. Mr. Binyon's delightful dissertations on Chinese pictorial art and Sir Francis Piggott's appreciations of Japanese decorative art are the two revelations of the twentieth century in their own line. We have noted that the last chapter of Sir Francis' work is devoted to a study of the Pakwa diapers and the Key border. Hitherto it has been an article of faith in art circles that China derived the "Key border" from Greece; that this familiar decorative design was a gift from Græco-Buddhistic art; that it came to China via India at the time of Alexander's conquests and that it reached Japan from Korea. The late Dr. W. Anderson lent the weight of his great authority to support this theory. But Sir Francis Piggott shatters it. He shows—conclusively in our opinion—that the Key border was derived from the Pakwa; in other words, from a recognised religious symbol of the Orient, and that, so far as Greece was concerned, she entered into possession of the design by borrowing from China. Incidentally, Sir Francis discusses the origin of the Svastika or fylfot, which by ordinary lexicons is defined as a "rebated cross," but which Sir Francis, deriving it from the Pakwa, prefers to call "the Wheel of Life." We close this fascinating volume with reluctance, and with a strong recommendation to our readers to lose no time in furnishing themselves with a copy.

A History of Japan. Vol. I. From the Origins to the Arrival of the Portuguese in 1543 A.D. By JAMES MURDOCH, M.A. (sometime Assistant Professor of Greek in Aberdeen University). Published by the Asiatic Society of Japan, 1910.

I.

THE reading public owes a debt of gratitude to the Asiatic Society of Japan for going to the expense of publishing Vols. I. and III. of Mr. Murdoch's History of Japan. Vol. III. is still in the author's hands, but it will no doubt appear in the course of a few years. Authors are seldom capitalists, and hence it follows that, from lack of funds, they are often compelled to refrain from the preparation of highly valuable learned works whose sale is comparatively limited. Mr. Murdoch's work as a historian and a critic is well known to the world. Several years ago he published as a private venture a book entitled "A History of Japan during the Century of Early European Intercourse (1542-1651), an Octavo volume of 714 pages, with Maps. Commenting on that volume and its compiler in the columns of the Kobe Chronicle, Mr. B. H. Chamberlain expressed himself thus:—"To be sure few investigators are equipped for such a task as he (Mr. Murdoch) is. Latin, Italian, Portuguese, Spanish, French, also Dutch, German, and of course English, in which eight languages the original documents on the European side are severally composed, are all familiar to him; and to guard against a perhaps insufficient mastery over Japanese, he has associated with himself a Japanese collaborator, who has supplied excellent translations from the standard Japanese authorities and from manuscripts hitherto unpublished. Mr. Murdoch's general culture includes an intimate acquaintance with the standard literature of Europe, ancient as well as modern, and more especially with European history. When we add to this that he proves himself to possess the historic sense and the impartial mind, and that he is the spokesman of no party, either religious or political, it is evident that the beau ideal of a historian is here very nearly realised."

Mr. Murdoch is in the fortunate position of possessing the necessary leisure for the compilation of an elaborate and learned work such as the one he has now given us. It requires no small amount of pluck to tackle such a gigantic task as the conversion of the chaos of Japanese ancient history into such a well-ordered cosmos as the one Mr. Murdoch has created. So called historic truth, in that it depends on evidence drawn from slipshod writers, from documents that were penned in uncritical ages, often for political purposes, can never claim to be thoroughly trustworthy. How far the early Chinese and Korean comments on Japan, to the discussion of which Mr. Murdoch devotes a chapter of his History, are reliable, it is impossible to say. Many of the statements of Chinese writers on Japanese subjects found in ancient records have been shown by Japanese scholars to be erroneous. It amounts to this, that in the ages which Mr. Murdoch's History deals with, thoroughly reliable authorities did not exist, and we are therefore solely dependent on the judgment and critical acumen of the modern historian for the settlement of the question as to how much weight is to be given to the testimony of each writer quoted.

One thing strikes a reader of Mr. Murdoch's History very forcibly, and that is the open-mindedness of the author. Mr. Murdoch does not write like a historian who sets out with certain fixed theories and subsequently marshals his facts in such a way that they shall support these theories and no others. Such opinions as Mr. Murdoch expresses from time to time have evidently been formed as a result of patient study and research, and to these opinions I for one attach much value; since there is no European or American in this country who has given so much time and attention to the study of Japanese history as Mr. Murdoch. It is therefore highly important that the reading public should know what conclusions Mr. Murdoch has reached as a result of unbiassed examination of the records on which all historians in this country depend for their knowledge of what actually happened in the early Christian centuries and the Middle Ages. Part of his work may be described as destructive and part as constructive. He has swept away much that has passed as history among the conservative School of Japanese historians. Trees that have cumbered historic ground this woodman has not spared. Chamberlain and Aston have accomplished much in this line. In dealing with the Kojiki and the Nihongi Mr. Murdoch has stated the theories which these two eminent scholars elaborated in a concise and trenchant way. Considerable interest is attached to what may be designated the constructive part of Mr. Murdoch's book. He rightly claims that it is impossible to understand modern Japan without possessing a minute knowledge of the stages of development through which the nation has passed.

Without further preface I shall in this and a subsequent article furnish in as small a compass as possible a statement of the contents of the book and of its salient features together with certain of the views adopted by the author. I will begin with the Introduction, which covers 30 pages.

In the opening Chapter of his work Mr. Murdoch draws attention to the great diversity that has always existed between the Japanese and ourselves, a diversity that, as far as the bulk of the nation is concerned, is as marked in this 43rd year of Meiji as it ever was. On this topic Mr. Murdoch writes:—"With us, thanks greatly to the Roman Law, the social unit is the individual; in Japan from time immemorial it has been the family. Hence for our intense individualism the islanders of the Far East could have, and had, but little sympathy. Their art canons were not those of peoples that drew their inspiration from ancient Hellas; the concepts of their philosophy and of ours seemed to lie in entirely different fields; their ideas of poetry were such that the highest fetches of the European muse were meaningless to them, while not a few of the leading ideas in their literature, if they did not actually elude, at all events failed to excite any emotion, except perhaps sheer amazement in the mind of the European reader. When their thoughts were even as ours, the expression of them was cast in an entirely different mould. Everwhere the qualifying word, or phrase or clause before what it modified, no relative pronoun, little or no personification, and as often as not predicates without subjects."

Mr. Murdoch is of opinion that Japanese have always been intellectually active. What Xavier wrote of them in 1551 he thinks applies to their mental state in earlier times:—"These Japanese are supremely curious—eager to be instructed to the highest degree. Their spirit of curiosity is such that they become importunate; they ask questions and argue without knowing how to make an end of it; eager to have an answer and to communicate what they have learned to others." It must be borne in mind that the Jesuits were at this time among the finest schoolmasters of Europe. They are unanimous, Mr. Murdoch tells us, in rating the capacities of the Japanese youth as much higher than those of European pupils generally at that time. In some cases, the Jesuits affirmed, Japanese students acquired a better knowledge of Latin in a few months than some Europeans do in many years.

According to Mr. Murdoch the introduction of the Sung Philosophy in Japan at the beginning of the 17th century played the part of the European Scholasticism of the eleventh, the twelfth and the thirteenth centuries; it sharpened the reasoning faculties of Japanese scholars, but it failed to add to the stock of general knowledge, owing to the worthlessness of the assumptions on which the reasoning of the Japanese disciples of Chutsz was based. Mr. Murdoch thus concisely states his opinion as to the intellectual position occupied by Japan in 1854:—

"In the year 1854, Japan, intellectually speaking, stood mutatis mutandis, pretty much where Europe did in the days of William of Occam. Chinese philosophy had done and was then doing for Japan what Scholasticism had done for Europe four or five long centuries before. William of Occam died in 1347, and with him all that was vital in the lore of the Schoolmen departed. Yet Scholasticism continued to stalk abroad as a sort of venerable gibbering ghost until the death of Saurez in 1617. It was just about this date that the Sung philosophy was beginning to make real substantial headway in Japan. For two centuries and a half it was all powerful in the Island Empire; even in 1854 it was lustily, nay militantly, vigorous."

After touching on the effect of the teaching of rival schools of philosophy, of that of the advocates of pure Shintō and of that of the enthusiasts who favoured Dutch learning on the Japanese mind, Mr. Murdoch goes on to call attention to the fact that in two generations during this Meiji era Japan leapt from a condition of culture analogous to that of the fourteenth century in the West to one fully in line with that of Europe to-day.

"All the secret lore Europe has been laboriously wresting from nature for the last three centuries Japan has brilliantly mastered in less than fifty years." Mr. Murdoch does not think the Japanese are incapable of making discoveries of their own. Already in Medicine, in Chemistry, in Physics, in Seismology, in Bacteriology, Japan has begun to contribute to the general store of international knowledge valuable material. But in making up the leeway of three hundred years the Japanese have taxed all their powers during the past few decades. It is as yet too early to decide how they will compare with other nations as inventors and discoverers. Mr. Murdoch observes that among all the assets of Japan the national intellect is by far the most considerable. The high average of intelligence throughout the nation doubtless accounts for the inherent capacity for organisation, to which Mr. Murdoch draws special attention—a capacity that served the Japanese in such good stead in their two great wars.

Mr. Murdoch, for reasons which he states with considerable minuteness and force, has reached the conclusion "that it is in her armaments that Japan is seen at her best." In building a house the Japanese, after laying a fairly stable support for the uprights and placing them in position, proceeds to clap on the roof, leaving the rest of the structure to be completed at leisure, months or even years passing before the dwelling is ready for occupation. "In her army and navy Japan has provided herself with a national roof more than strong enough to safeguard her against all possible external dangers. But it has been reared somewhat at the expense of the general efficiency of the national fabric which supports it, and which it exists to protect. In other words the creation of her armaments has put a severe strain upon Japan's economic resources."

Mr. Murdoch next goes on to show how poverty-stricken Japan was when she set out on her new career of progress. This was the result of backwardness in the development of agriculture and the insignificance of her manufactures, added to ruinous export of metals that went on for a series of years. In 1708 Arai Hakuseki computed that some 15,000 kobans left the country every year; so that in ten years a sum of £2,250,000 was exported.

After showing that the present Imperial Cabinet of ten Ministers with their departments and departmental officials is a modified revival of the Eight Boards adapted from China and established in the seventh Century and that the division of the country into ken, gun and son was also a revival of the system of local administration introduced from China at the same period, Mr. Murdoch goes on to give us the plan he decided to follow in his History. According to him Japanese history may conveniently be divided into seven periods as follows:—(1) Ancient Japan before the great Reform of 645 A.D. (2) From 645 to about 1145—the Fujiwara Age. (3) From 1156 to 1322. (4) From 1338 to 1573. (5) From 1542 to 1616. (6) From 1616 to 1854. (7) From 1868 to 1910. It will be seen that Period 5 was dealt with in The History of Japan during the Century of Early European Intercourse, published a few years ago. Periods 6 and 7 will have a separate volume devoted to them.

All critical students of Japanese ancient history will agree with Mr. Murdoch when he says:—"The work of the historian on this period (prior to the Reform of A.D. 645) can be only tentative at best, for the story can only be reconstructed in the fashion in which the tale of contemporary Celtic Britain can be reconstructed. Such written documents as deal with it were composed in the subsequent period. Indeed the earliest Japanese records were compiled almost exactly when the Venerable Bede was beginning work on the Ecclesiastical History of our Island and Nation. And just as, apart from the inferences that may be gathered from archaeological remains, our most trustworthy information about Celtic Britain is to be found in Cæsar and other foreign authors, so the historian of Ancient Japan finds stray notices in contemporary Chinese records of inestimable value when he essays the task of penetrating the darkness that enshrouds the origins of the Japanese people. Inasmuch as the art of writing seems to have been introduced into Japan only a little before the date when Honorius withdrew the Roman legions from Britain (410 A.D.), these Chinese notices of Japan become almost as precious to the historian as the leaves of the Cumæan Sibyl were to the Roman King of old."

By most of the foreigners who have undertaken to write on Japanese history the Ashikaga period has been regarded as the most barren and unprofitable in the annals of the nation, but Mr. Murdoch, whom we may correctly describe as the most enthusiastic of all writers on Japanese history, maintains and marshals facts to demonstrate that modern Japan owes much to the period when the system of predial serfdom so long in force was finally shattered, when a great development in pictorial art was witnessed, when the first attempt to establish an over-sea commerce was made, and when a still more remarkable phenomenon was seen, the founding of a City (Sakai) that closely resembled one of the Italian City Republics of the Middle Ages. In the latter days of the Ashikaga rule the citizens of Sakai were sufficiently powerful to challenge the arrogant pretensions of the overbearing Buke or military class by which they were confronted. In a very interesting manner Mr. Murdoch shows how the series of events which preceded the final overthrow of the Ashikaga Shogunate brought into existence some of the greatest generals and administrators Japan has ever possessed. Nobunaga, Hideyoshi, Ieyasu, Takeda, Uesugi, Hōjō, Mōri (Motonari), Chisokabe, Ōtomo, Ryūzōji and Shimazu were all to a great extent the product of the age which gave them birth. As Mr. Murdoch points out, "Under a strong central government there would have been no opportunity for these men to prove their sterling mettle. It was the very stress and struggle of the later Ashikaga times that tested and tempered and schooled the youth of such men, and furnished the early training and discipline that lay at the base of their subsequent greatness. But for this very stress and struggle the annals of Japan during the first half of the century of early foreign intercourse would have been less remarkable for the long roll of illustrious names that lends such an unusual and dazzling lustre to them, and would have lacked many of their most stirring and picturesque pages."

The above remarks and hundreds of other passages to be found in the History suffice to show how richly endowed with the instincts and the aspirations of the true historian is the author of this instructive work. A historian to the manner born must always be an enthusiast, or he will be repelled by the unpromising appearance of the material which he has to work into shape and for which he has to find a suitable place in the structure he is erecting. That Japanese historic annals, in the form they have hitherto been given to the world, have proved very dry reading is certainly the opinion of the majority of foreign perusers of these records. But no scholar will deny that Mr. Murdoch has succeeded in telling the story of Japanese national development in a more entertaining and instructive manner than it has ever been told. It is not for a moment to be supposed that all the author's theories are absolutely correct. Some of them are merely tentative and are probably only intended as suggestions, or possible explanations of events that occurred. But the earnestness with which Mr. Murdoch discusses each question, event, or theory will certainly have the effect of exciting interest in the mind of every reader of his History in topics which might otherwise appear unimportant. When one observes the patient and painstaking way in which Mr. Murdoch collects and arranges evidence bearing on disputed points, and notes the unimpassioned and unbiassed manner in which he draws his conclusions from the facts which he has culled from so many different sources, one perceives that in him the critical faculty is highly developed. That he is a great admirer of the Japanese and that the gigantic task of preparing a history of Japan that will eventually cover over 2,000 octavo pages is with him a work of love, goes without saying. Every scholar in this country, and not a few in other lands, can not but rejoice that we have here a learned Society in possession of sufficient available funds to cover the heavy expense of the publication of such bulky volumes as those with which Mr. Murdoch is enriching the libraries of the world.

In this article I have confined myself to general remarks on the nature of the History under review, in a second notice of the book I propose to give in an abbreviated form the views of the author on some of the disputed and important questions connected with Japanese history. Because it is unquestionable that Mr. Murdoch has qualified himself to speak with great authority concerning all that forms a part of a field of research which he has explored more minutely than any European writer living.

II.

THE first chapter of Mr. Murdoch's History of Japan entitled Protohistoric Japan deals with the undetermined question of the origin or origins of the Japanese. Like other writers on this subject, Mr. Murdoch attaches great importance to Japan's connection with Korea in the early Christian centuries, to which special attention is drawn in the Nihongi. Shortly after the withdrawal of the Chinese from Korea in the first century B.C. three Kingdoms were founded: (1) Koguryu in the North (called Koma in Japanese annals) established in B.C. 37 and lasting down to 668 A.D.; (2) Silla (called Shiragi in the Nihongi), founded in B.C. 57 and continuing till 935 A.D. and (3) Pakche (called Kudara by the Japanese) which lasted from B.C. 17 to 650 A.D. The relations between the Japanese and Silla were generally hostile and it was this State that Jingō Kōgō is alleged to have conquered in 200 A.D. From Pakche it was that the inhabitants of these islands obtained their first knowledge of continental civilisation. But along the southern sea-board opposite a line drawn from Tsushima to Quelpart and for more than a hundred miles inland, there existed in the early Christian centuries a loose confederacy which was neither subject to Silla nor to Pakche. Japanese influence in this territory was very strong. There were settled the Han tribes, the Ma-han, the Chin-han and the Pyonhan, who, Mr. Hulbert contends, were not of northern but southern origin and who according to this authority reached Korea from over-sea. Two of these tribes had the Japanese for neighbours and were much influenced by contact with them. The Han language, Mr. Murdoch holds, became the basic element in Korean, notwithstanding the fact that modern Korean in its vocabulary shows few signs of this. On the question of the origin of the Japanese, here is an epitome of Mr. Murdoch's opinion expressed in his own words:—"The inhabitants of the Lūchū, of Satsuma and the rest of Southern Kyūshū and the peoples of the old Hans in Korea are, or were, of the same stock or origin—either Malay or Indonesian. And just as the people of the three Hans supplied the basic element in the Korean language, so those of Lūchū and Kyūshū have furnished that element in the tongue of modern Japan. Furthermore, they have furnished Japan with her Imperial House and with the greater part of her aristocracy and ruling caste. So far from southern Kyūshū and Lūchū having been peopled from Korea, it is not at all either impossible or even unlikely that it was South-Western Korea that was peopled from Lūchū and Kyūshū. That Southern Kyūshū and South-Western Korea should have been settled by immigrants from the Southern Seas need excite less surprise than the fact that Madagascar has been mainly peopled, not from the neighbouring continent of Africa, but from a remote Malay-Polynesian Centre."*

Concerning the origin of these Southern invaders and concerning the route by which they arrived in Japan there has been great difference of opinion. On this subject Sir Ernest Satow writes:—"Tradition points to a conquest of Japan from the side of Korea by a people settling in Idzumo and speaking a language allied to Korean. These were followed by a race of warriors coming from the South and landing in Hyūga (Hyūga in primæval times included Ōsumi and Satsuma. It was in Ōsumi that the Emperor Jimmu and his ancestors settled)—it might be Malay or perhaps a branch of that warlike and intelligent race of which a branch survives in New Zealand." Dr. Baelz holds an opposite theory. He maintains that the warriors referred to above, though not of the same stock as the settlers in Idzumo, entered Japan by the same route as these settlers, that is, through Korea. After carefully going over all that has been written on the origin of the Japanese, Mr. Murdoch has come to the conclusion that "it is questionable whether we can ever rise to anything beyond a mere conflict of rival hypotheses." Learned opinion is by no means agreed as to when writing was introduced into Korea. One great authority, Tong-Kam, asserts that the Kingdom of Pakche at any rate had no writing previous to 375 A.D. This means that the statements found in Korean histories, which were compiled centuries later, all rest on oral tradition or were quoted from Chinese records. Mr. Murdoch ridicules the faith put in early Korean records by Mr. Hulbert as unwarranted by facts. As for the dates given in the Nihongi for events which took place hundreds of years before that work was compiled, Aston and the great Japanese scholar Motoori have shown that they are all wrong by 120 years. This means that certain events assigned to 225, 260, 265, 272 and 277 by the Nihongi really occurred in 354, 380, 385, 392 and 397 respectively. It must be continually borne in mind that neither the Kojiki nor the Nihongi gives us the traditions of ancient Japan, but merely a selection from these traditions. Yasumaro, who edited and committed the Kojiki to writing and who was also joint author of the later Nihongi, tells us this expressly in his preface:—"Then on Nov. 3rd, 711, the ruling Empress Gemmyō commanded me, Yasumaro, to select and record the old words learnt by Hiyedano-Are according to the Imperial Decree, and dutifully to lift them up to Her. In reverent obedience to the contents of the Decree I have made a careful choice." The general impression made on readers of this part of Mr. Murdoch's work will certainly be that the early history of the Japanese people is enveloped in mist and that it is impossible to be sure of one's facts owing to insufficiency of reliable data.

* And in Madagascar too the immigrating tribes, the Hovas, subdued and governed the Sakalavas and Betsimisaraka races.

When we pass on to the perusal of the chapter which describes the Great Reform of 645, we find ourselves on solid ground. No event in ancient times played so important a part in the history of national development as the issue of the four famous Edicts which may be said to have Sinicized the Japanese Government. Into the provisions of these edicts it is impossible to go here. A few extracts from Mr. Murdoch's account of the age in which this great political transformation took place will certainly be of interest to readers of this journal. "In Japan at this time (645) there was not one single town in the Chinese sense of the word. On the death of a sovereign—and often on other occasions—the palace was abandoned and the Imperial residence transferred to some other of the Imperial manors in what were to be known as the Home Provinces (Go-kinai)* from 646 onward. . . . Furthermore there was the idea that death defiled the dwelling where it occurred." Taxes were all paid in produce at this time. Often it happened that no suitable payment could be made by persons liable to taxation and in these cases they were required to put their contributions together and purchase a horse. The decree on this tax ran thus:—"For horses for public service, let every hundred houses contribute one horse of medium quality. Or if the horse is of superior quality let one be contributed by every two hundred houses. If the horses have to be purchased, the price shall be made up by a payment of twelve feet of cloth for each house."

In the Code of Taihō (702) there is a full account of Japan's first central organization with its Dajōkwan or Council of State (abolished in 1885), consisting of the Sadaijin, Minister of the Left, an Udaijin, Minister of the Right, Dainagon, First Adviser of State, and the Minister of the Imperial Household. Under this Council there were eight Boards. Mr. Murdoch draws attention to the enormous importance attached to ceremony at that time and in after ages. Three of the eight Ministries were occupied with the details of ceremonial and another superintended court affairs:—"A full half of the elaborate machinery of the Government was thus almost exclusively occupied with the affairs of a select aristocracy of perhaps less than 10,000 individuals all told in a population of some four millions." One of the proofs of the thoroughness with which the old Yamato-damashii was permeated with Chinese thought is seen in that strong attachment to ceremony which is an ineradicable element in Japanese character. What Cullery says of the Chinese applies to the Japanese to a considerable extent "For it (China) ceremonial is man, the man moral, the man politic, the man religious, in its numberless relations with the family, society, the State, morality and religion."

One noteworthy characteristic of the new form of government established in 645 was the comparative insignificance of the Ministry of Justice and the Ministry of War in that age. In those days, Mr. Murdoch tells us, "every one appreciated the importance of agreeing with his adversary quickly lest worse betide. As regards the rank of the Ministry of War, the situation is very different to-day. As Mr. Murdoch reminds us, "The War Office and the Admiralty are of all Ministries the strongest in the Empire." With the sway exercised by the great Sat-chō heads of the two services no political party, no Minister of State is allowed to interfere. The lion's share of the taxes falls to them. Only what they leave is available for education or other purposes. "On none in the public service of Japan," says Mr. Murdoch correctly, "are titles of nobility, high rank, and still more substantial emoluments showered with more liberal hand than upon the great captains and the great sailors of the Empire. In China, on the other hand, the military man is, if not a pariah, at all events an exceptional barbarian, whom policy makes it advisable to treat with a certain amount of gracious, albeit semi-contemptuous condescension. In old Japan it was this Chinese view of the case that prevailed for centuries after the Reform of 646. To guileless Europeans who have heard so much of the *Samurai and of Bushi-dō—the Way of the Warrior,—this statement may very well come as something of a shock. But it is simple, sober, literal truth."

One might suppose that the newly established Government, in that in China the administrative system in force had as one of its chief objects the suppression of feudalism and the prevention of its reappearance, would have rendered the development of a privileged class, which prepared the way for military caste, impossible, but the opposing forces were too great to make this practicable. And so we find that in 682 Emperor Temmu issued the following edict:—"Let the lineage and character of all candidates for office be inquired into before a selection is made. None whose lineage is insufficient are eligible for appointments, even although their character, conduct and capacity may be unexceptional. Thus was a hereditary governing caste created."

Mr. Murdoch's comments on the attitude of the new Government to the various cults and the development which religion underwent at that time, may be summed up in the statement that the upper classes regulated their lives by Confucianism and that Buddhism too was then mainly a cult of the upper classes, though pains were taken to make use of it as an instrument for controlling the ignorant.

Mr. Murdoch devotes a chapter to a history of the reign of Kwammu Tennō. It was in this reign that a distinct military caste began to make its appearance. On this subject Mr. Murdoch writes:—"For the first five generations after the Reform of 645 the civil official had been what he is now in China,—almost everything. During that period there had been one great civil war, one considerable rebellion, and several lesser internal disturbances. But all these contests had been fought out by civilians armed for the occasion, and they had all without exception been of very brief duration."

One interesting part of this chapter is the account given of the power of the Ainus at this time. As early as 720 it had been found necessary to call out the militia of nine provinces in order to withstand their attacks, but in 789 we read that they beat the Japanese both on land and on the sea. A force of 52,800 men consuming 2,000 koku of rice per day found itself effectually blocked at Koromogawa and utterly unable to advance. It was not till 802 that that great warrior Saka-no-ue Tamuro Maro succeeded in effectually, though not finally, subjugating the hairy aborigines who had held out against the Japanese for 20 years. He received the title of Se-i-tai-Shōgun (Great Barbarian-subduing General) and became the first of the warrior statesmen of Japan, holding subsequently the office of Chūnagon and Dainagon in succession. In 812 the Ainus rose again, but the revolt was stamped out in a single campaign owing to the skilful generalship of Fumiya no Watamaro. At the conclusion of this campaign the Northern aborigines were for the first time placed on the same footing as ordinary Japanese subjects.

In Chapter IX. Mr. Murdoch goes minutely into the history of the great Fujiwara House. His opinion on the part played by Sugawara Michizane in the political events of that time is less favourable to that polished scholar than that held by many Japanese and some foreign historians, though he bears testimony to the brilliance of his career as perhaps the finest writer of that time. "Michizane was in no sense a reformer. . . . There is nothing to indicate that he had any real grip upon the essentials of the great problem of the time,—the economic and local administrative evils that were rapidly sapping the foundations of the Imperial power, eating into the vitals of the State and reducing it to anarchy from which it could only be rescued by the rise of the feudal system and that privileged military class it had been one of the main objects of the Reformers of 645 to prevent. Here Michizane appears to sad disadvantage alongside of Miyoshi Kiyotsura."

After devoting a chapter to "Cloistered Emperors" Mr. Murdoch proceeds to trace the steps by means of which Taira Kiyomori raised himself to power that overshadowed that wielded by the Emperor at that time. Concerning Kiyomori Mr. Murdoch quotes the saying:—"Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and others have greatness thrust upon 'em." Such measure of greatness as may be conceded to Kiyomori would seem to be derived from each of these sources in fairly even proportions."

The next Chapter deals with "The Fall of the Taira" and this is followed by one on "Yoritomo and His Work." Among the opening remarks of Chap. XIV on the Kamakura Bakufu there is a passage which draws attention to a peculiarity of Japanese politics, to an ineradicable national sentiment in reference to the Imperial line and its prerogatives. "In China, says Mr. Murdoch, and indeed in most European countries, it is almost certain new Imperial or Royal dynasties would have been established by such men as Taira Kiyomori, Yoritomo, Ashikaga Takauji, Nobunaga, Hideyoshi and Tokugawa Ieyasu. But not one of these great and illustrious subjects thought for a moment of usurping the throne. If constrained to do so by the exigencies of the situation, some of them, such as Ashikaga Takauji, would have small compunctions about replacing one titular sovereign by another. But the new and rival Emperor was invariably selected from among the lineal descendants of the Sun-Goddess. The simple fact is that the institution of the Emperor has always been a most convenient one through which to work in Japan."

* Yamashiro, Yamato, Kawachi, Settsu and Izumi.

* The word samurai, as the ideograph shows, means "one who waits" and the original samurai were very humble individuals who passed their time in menial service of different kinds.

When the Kamakura Bakufu fell it looked for a while as though military rule was at an end. The real Emperor, Daigō II., first set up his Court in Hōki, the place of his exile, but subsequently journeyed to Kyōto and assumed supreme power. Kōgon Tennō, the usurper, was not deposed; in theory he had never reigned. The Court nobles of that time felt sure that once more Kyōto was to be everything and the rest of the empire nothing. No longer now would the proudest Kuge have to go cap in hand to a Shōgun to receive their orders. Things were to revert to the conditions of the Engi period, that is to say, to that of the early half of the 10th century. But these nobles had reckoned without their hosts, the warriors who had overthrown the Hōjōs. Though in this Meiji era the men by means of whose swords a great revolution was effected consented to lay aside their weapons in obedience to the orders of civilians, in the fourteenth century the age was not ripe for the carrying out of any such heroic measures. It soon became quite evident that the country, was to be ruled by the sword, that military power had only changed hands—the Kamakura Shōguns were to be succeeded by the Ashikaga line of military despots, that was all. The account of the Succession Wars, the struggle between the Northern and Southern Courts, which lasted from 1337 to 1392, to be found in Chap XIX of Mr. Murdoch's History, is a lucid piece of writing, and when studied by means of the well-drawn coloured map supplied, one has no difficulty in mastering the numerous details which an intelligible history of 55 years of fighting must necessarily contain.

With a chapter on Ashikaga Feudalism, which is full of useful information carefully classified and succinctly set forth, this learned volume is brought to a close. The author has evidently prepared his index with the greatest care. There is one thing that one misses, and that is a separate list of the authorities consulted. The names of various writers will be found in footnotes, but for a book of reference such as this is designed to become something more than this seems desirable. The work is remarkably free from misprints* and the printing and general get-up of the book are first-class. That this and the other two Volumes on the history of Japan will for many years to come take the precedence of all else that has been published on this topic and contribute largely to the interest and the intelligibility of the numerous details given while conferring on their compiler lasting fame, will certainly be the opinion of all competent critics of this truly great work.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE JAPANESE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The Shin Bukkyō has just issued a special Number in commemoration of the tenth anniversary of the founding of the Sect whose organ this well-known magazine is. The Number contains great many well-written articles by the chief authorities on modern and ancient Buddhism, and by philosophers like Doctors Inoue Tetsujirō, Satō Hiroyuki, Miyake Setsurei, and others. In epitomizing as many of the articles as we can find place to notice here, we will begin with Mr. Sawayanagi's review of the history of the New Buddhists' Sect during the past ten years. When writing articles for the perusal of his own countrymen, Mr. Sawayanagi is never given to trimming. In the number of the Shin Bukkyō which we are reviewing there are no more outspoken utterances than those penned by this well-known educationist and devoted Buddhist. Here is the gist of his observations on the influence of the New Buddhists on religion, morals and philosophy during the last ten years:—

That the founding of the new sect called Shin Bukkyō was a progressive measure I am prepared to admit, but that the Sect itself has made any advance during the past ten years I fail to see. Though of course statistics bearing on the number of converts attached to each sect are not altogether reliable, I have a feeling that Buddhist adherents are on the decline. This might be inferred from the increase reported by Shintō sects like the Tenri-kyōkai and the Kinkō-kyōkai. This increase is certainly at the expense of a corresponding decrease of Buddhist converts. It seems to me that those who accept and believe in the deeper truths of Buddhism are certainly not growing larger in number as the years go by, even if it be true that they are not actually diminishing.

In my opinion the chief function of religion is the comfort and enlightenment of individuals, the planting of faith in the heart to an ineradicable extent. As regards works of charity, and the improvement of society generally, these are carried on as indirect and incidental effects of religious teaching, but they cannot be regarded as strictly religious at all. In this indirect work Buddhism cannot be said to have made any special progress during the last decade compared with that made by Christianity, which has concentrated its efforts on this class of work. During our war with Russia, although Buddhist chaplains were sent with the troops, the work they accomplished in the field was surpassed by that of Christian pastors.

Coming to the subject of the production of fine types of character in the ranks of the Buddhist priesthood in recent years, our experience has been, that while the older men of character are dying off, no young men make their appearance to fill the places of those departed. Just as old teachers of Chinese in this country are passing away without creating any worthy successors, so virtuous and highly respected old Buddhist priests are creating vacancies in the ranks of our Buddhist Sects which it is at present quite impossible to fill up. The number of Buddhist graduates at our universities has in recent years been very large, and though in former times such men were almost invariably sent to the University by the Shin Sect, now there is keen competition in giving priests a high education among all Buddhist sects. But when we come to ask whether these university graduates are well versed in Buddhist doctrines, the reply is that they are by no means so. Buddhism seems in their case to have been crowded out by other studies. Perhaps this is unavoidable while they are at the University, but in that case one would expect them to make use of the intellectual superiority acquired by the training received at the University for the purpose of studying Buddhism in after years in a more thorough manner than is possible in the case of men whose minds are undisciplined. But unfortunately instances are very rare in which this occurs. According to present appearances the higher education of Buddhist converts is not conducive to the progress of Buddhism. The sects are spending large sums of money on the training of young men in a manner which yields no good results from a strictly religious point of view.

Turning to Buddhist literature, the outlook is no more promising. It would be untrue to say that there is any solid progress here. Neither in general knowledge, in history, nor in philosophy, has any new investigation been carried on by our Sect. After surveying the whole field, I have reached the conclusion that we are standing still, that we are quite asleep. To take an optimistic view of the situation is impossible. (Bukkyōkai no jūnen wa rakkwan subeki mono de naku, hikwan subeki mono de aru to omou).

Mr. Sawayanagi has more to say of the same kind. Nothing could be more gloomy than the picture he paints. There is no gleam of sunshine anywhere. He concludes his article by observing that things must grow worse before they can mend. Even now priests find it hard to live, but according to Mr. Sawayanagi, they must be reduced to still more grinding poverty before they will realize what is the matter. No religion has a better set of doctrines than Buddhism, it is living exponents and examples of the nobleness of its teaching that this creed so sadly needs in Japan to-day, concludes Mr. Sawayanagi.

Dr. Nanjō says that he knows little about the doings of the New Buddhists and that he has not found time to read their magazine. But as regards the progress made by Buddhists in the past 10 years, he thinks it worthy of mention that Buddhist preaching services and lectures have of late been much more largely attended than they were a few years ago, and he says that nothing could exceed the earnestness with which sermons are listened to by the large audiences which he himself has often joined. He thinks that the late war in some way convinced Japanese society of the need of religion.

Dr. Takakusu writes in hopeful tones of the future of New Buddhism. He notes that the conditions which led to the formation of the sect known as the Shin Bukkyō-ha were precisely those which induced Shaka Muni to found a new religion. It was the formalism, superstition, idle speculation, class-distinctions and theological dogmatism that characterized orthodox Brahmanism which appeared so repellent to a spiritually-minded and practical man like Shaka, and so he gave to the world a religion which was at once ethical, philosophical, practical and secular. But as time went on, all the evils from which Shaka delivered his followers returned, and the work of reform had to begin over again. That the new Buddhists are on the right track Dr. Takakusu feels sure. But to him it appears that the work they have accomplished in the last decade has been no more than preparatory. Their big battle with opposing forces has still to be fought. They must adapt themselves to the spirit of the age, which demands from all religious teachers practicality, moral excellence, philosophy, and earnestness in the cause of social reform.

Dr. K. Ukita affirms that the views held by the new Buddhists on religion represent the conclusions he himself has reached. There is no bigotry or narrow-mindedness about the adherents of this Sect. They accept whole-heartedly the teaching of science and such doctrines of other religious sects as appear to be supported by reason. Dr. Ukita says that in Japanese ancient poetry he has discovered much Buddhist thought which is in entire agreement with the teaching of modern science. The Buddhist attempts to explain the principles which govern nature have been remarkably successful, considering the ages in which they were made, says Dr. Ukita.

Dr. Murakami Sensei, one of the greatest of all authorities on Chinese and Japanese Buddhism, in an article published in the number of the Shin Bukkyō we are reviewing, compares the fortunes of the creed in the two countries. He says that during the three thousand years of its history, as far as its literature is concerned, Buddhism has nowhere undergone such development as it has in China. Concerning Buddhist sects in China he observes that ages of division and sub-division have been followed by a remarkable state of union. In Japan schism has been carried to greater lengths than it has been in China. Prior to the Kamakura era there were in Japan eight sects only, but in that age the Zen, the Shin and a vast number of sub sects were formed, and the members of these sects indulged in the most ridiculous hair-splitting, not on doctrines only but on all sorts of trifles. If they read the same scriptures, they quarrelled over the way in which they should be read. Even the manner in which flowers should be set up in temples or offerings placed on the altar became subjects of noisy dispute. We have not even to-day passed the age of division, says Dr. Murakami. But is union among us desirable? This is questionable (Shikashi gōdō ga hatashite yorokobubeki mono naru ka ina ka wa gimon de aru). To Dr. Murakami it does not appear as though there were anything in New Buddhism of any great importance. In the concluding part of his article he says that whereas the Neo-Buddhists do a certain amount of good among educated young men, they have no message for the ignorant, the old and the wearied. A religion that has no words of comfort for those who have reached a stage of life when physical and mental pleasures are alike curtailed, when gloom is apt to envelop the soul and loneliness of spirit to be a constant companion, lacks one of the most valuable of all the characteristics of religious faith. At such a time as this mere theories and logic-chopping fail to give satisfaction.

* Attention may be called to one on p. 10, however, where Fujiwara Seigwa is represented as living 100 years—from 1500 to 1600. The correct figures are from 1561 to 1619.

Dr. Katō Hiroyuki, like the other gentlemen from whom we have quoted above, attended the huge meeting held in honour of the tenth anniversary of the founding of the New Buddhists' Sect, and in his address delivered on that occasion, spoke his mind unreservedly. We have no space for a full epitome of his speech, but among other observations the following seem to us worthy of attention:—

The members of this Association have always shown great zeal and steadfastness of purpose, and I for one have no little admiration for men who have these qualities, but nevertheless in reference to the scheme which they are bent on carrying out I have something to say which may seem somewhat out of keeping with the tone of the proceedings here to day. In recent times Buddhism has done nothing but go from bad to worse, and it is to-day in a pitiable condition. It is just living on the small amount of more than half spent energy that remains to it. It still succeeds in giving a certain amount of comfort to ignorant old men and old women on whom its priests manage to impose. It is not the Buddhist religion that is bad, but its professors. As a religion, Buddhism is superior to Christianity, but Christian pastors are greatly superior to Buddhist priests. Now it is to this point that I wish to draw the attention of the members of the Sect. What the Sect should aim to do is to effect a practical reform in the Buddhist ranks, to turn out a new class of Buddhist teachers, to save Buddhism from extinction. Buddhism to-day is confronted by Christianity, which comes from abroad, and by such low-class teaching as that of the Tenrikyō. Although there are among the Buddhists a small number of highly respected and highly virtuous priests, they are known more as scholars and men of refinement than as teachers of religion. The influence they exercise on the millions of professing Buddhists is infinitesimally small. Speaking of the religion generally, we may say that it has descended to the level of a sale of prayers and ceremonies for such payment as people can be induced to make.

Dr. Katō then cited, as an illustration of the extent to which the secularization of Buddhism has taken place, the tactics adopted by the Shin priests attached to the Eastern Hongwanji to pay off the heavy debt incurred by that temple. Not only did they sell all the hierlooms of the temple, but they scoured the country for the purpose of extracting from the purses of poverty stricken ignorant adherents of the Sect every sen procurable, on the plea that the givers were laying up treasure for themselves in heaven by providing money to pay off debts caused by extravagance or at any rate unwarranted expenditure in the past and by making the same misuse of money possible in the future. In conclusion Dr. Katō says, "Whether the present occasion is one that calls for congratulation or for condolence is perhaps a little uncertain, but my advice to the clever and well educated young men who belong to this Association is that they set themselves earnestly to reform the evils of society, which every day seem to grow worse, and leave off fruitless disputation."

Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō's interesting address is reported at great length in the pages of the July Shin Bukkyō. On many of the points discussed by Dr. Katō, Dr. Inoue expressed a different opinion. In reference to the New Buddhists regarded as a Sect, Dr. Inoue represents them to be a very powerful body (Konnichi no Bukkyō kai ni oite wa mottomo yūryoku naru dantai no hitotsu de aru to kangayete orimasu). Since Dr. Inoue's address covers some fifteen pages of the Magazine, reproduction even in an abbreviated form here is out of the question.

Reports of some sixty addresses appear in the Shin Bukkyō of July, which we would recommend missionaries to study for themselves. These speeches convey a very accurate representation of the state of religious opinion in this country at the present time. The meeting convened by the New Buddhists was a veritable tour de force the like of which has not been seen in this country for a long time. The fact that so many of the leading scholars, priests and philosophers responded to the invitation of the New Buddhists to take part in the proceedings furnishes ample proof of the respect felt for the Sect in learned circles.

Dr. Miyake Setsurei's address was entitled New-Buddhists and New-Christians. He showed that in the main the movement in Christendom in favour of dropping out references to a future life from the sermons and lectures delivered, and of preaching on ethics, the uses to which religion can be put in this world, charity, social reform, and the like, is precisely identical with what the New-Buddhists regard to be their special mission. The movement in each case had its origin in pressure from without. Neo-Buddhism, like Neo-Christianity, is an attempt to meet the demands of the leaders of thought to-day.

An article which appeared some weeks ago in the Kirisutokyō Sekai entitled A Great Defect in our National Education has attracted considerable attention in the religious press. In very temperate and guarded language it points out that, excellent in many respects as is Japan's system of education and abundant as is the good fruit it has borne, it has one serious defect, and that is the narrowness of the ideal it sets before young men and young women. For the past forty years the Department of Education has never preached anything more than Chū-kun ai-koku, loyalty to superiors and love of country. It has never aimed at mental or spiritual development of any kind beyond what is required for the production of obedient citizens. It is somewhat surprising that even a statesman who has spent his whole life in preaching liberty, independence and the development of special individual intellectual and moral powers should in his old age have brought out a Reader that is ultra-conservative in type, that reiterates and emphasizes the old watchwords and gives no hint that a new educational ideal possessing a wider and a superior outlook is one of the great wants of the present age. That one of the chief objects of State education is to impress upon the minds of the young the necessity of bowing to lawful authority goes without saying. In loyalty to the throne and in respect for the powers that be, we Christians are not surpassed by any other class of citizens, says the Kirisutokyō Sekai, but it seems to us that in addition to our duties as Japanese subjects we have numerous obligations as citizens of the world, as members of the human family and as the transmitters of a message containing glad tidings for mankind. We regard all men as our brethren. We recognize that religion and morality have authority that is separate from that of the State and the Law (Seiji, hōritsu igwai ni shūkyō dōtoku no ken'i wo mitome). We realize that we have relations to the Universe and to the Supreme Being and that we are endowed with spiritual aspirations that need satisfying. Of these things our narrow-minded educationists take no account. The way in which the minds of the young are exclusively centred on this one country and its affairs and the efforts that are made to feed the fire of patriotism are very harmful in many ways, tending to encourage national vanity and to encourage jingoism of a dangerous type. National education conducted on these narrow lines is assuredly most defective, and everyone who has the future welfare of the nation at heart must be apprehensive as to the results of the further pursuance of this short-sighted policy. (Hōka no zento no tame ni utata yūryo ni taeraru nari). The more stress there is laid on the importance of loyalty to superiors and love of country, the less is faithfulness and real love displayed in the daily lives of our people. The Imperial Rescript is read repeatedly, but the culture of virtue is not promoted thereby. Universal love and the great doctrines of humanity are not taught in our State Schools and we are suffering much from this defect.

In the July Kaitakusha we find an article contributed by Mr. S. Nemoto, Member of the House of Representatives, on the large number of high-class idle people there are in this country. This phenomenon, he argues, has been brought about by a variety of causes. From ancient times the Japanese gentry have always despised manual labour of every kind, and this antipathy to working with the hands has spread to the middle classes, most of whom prefer to receive very low salaries rather than apply themselves to work which would yield greater profits. This feeling is doubtless one of the remnants of feudalism and should have long since disappeared, but of its disappearance there are as yet no signs. Four causes may be alleged for the love of ease and luxury which characterizes the higher classes in this country at the present time.

(1.) Lack of humility.—Those who do not work are often too proud to work. They think that work is beneath their dignity. Some of these are learned, and they consider that their scholarship exempts them from the obligation of undertaking any earnest work. If we turn to Christian countries, and ask ourselves how it is that they have become so wealthy and prosperous, the answer is that Christians are endowed with sufficient humility to make them take to work congenially. One would think that we Japanese would have learned the lesson of humility from the Chinese and the Koreans, from whom in ancient times we obtained so many intellectual and moral benefits. Humility has too again and again been preached to us from the throne in Imperial Ordinances, but still there is no denying that our higher classes have not yet learned the lesson of lowliness of mind.

(2.) Lack of perseverance.—That we Japanese are deficient in the spirit of persistency is undeniable. The anti-Japanese spirit in America concerns the lower orders, and hence too much importance is not to be attached to it. Nevertheless, to a certain extent the opposition which our countrymen have encountered in the States is to be attributed to their fickleness. But it is no doubt true that there are Japanese living in foreign countries who are gradually learning from Anglo-Saxons how to stick to work that has been commenced until it has been successfully finished.

(3.) Lack of devotion to a cause.—Among the upper classes there are many who never get enthusiastic about anything. In order to become useful members of society we must have some special aims in life and we must persistently endeavour to enlist public sympathy with these objects.

(4.) Lack of optimism.—We are born into this world to enjoy ourselves. Cheerfulness is necessary to activity. Idle people often lack this because they do nothing but think of their own affairs and worry about small vexations. In the great outside world there is to be seen much that should gladden the hearts of onlookers. Idleness is conducive to gloom.

Capt. T. Okada contributes an article to the July Kaitakusha entitled "An Important Duty with Religious People." The important duty is to alter religious teaching so as to bring it into agreement with current thought. There are ages, says Captain Okada, when religious zeal is fervent, when religious feeling and life carry everything before them. The doctrines taught at that time suit the minds of those for whose benefit they are elaborated. But these doctrines often fail to meet the requirements of a succeeding age. Religious doctrines to-day are to a large extent unsuited to the age. (Genson no kyōgi ōku wa hi [非] ni shite, jisei ni tekiō sezu.) The new type of man is not satisfied with traditional thought. Modern thought and religious teaching are at variance with each other. It is an urgent duty with Christians to bring them into line. This must be done by analysing current religious doctrines and keeping only what is worthy of being retained. But when we come to ask whether it is possible to restore the old religious life to-day along with the change of doctrines, the reply is that this is by no means certain. It would seem to be an undeniable truth that religious activity has hitherto been greatest in non-intellectual ages.

There is truth in the remark that religion depends more on the characters of its professors than on thought. Great men, we are told, are needed to give a new impetus to religious teaching. But it must not be forgotten that the term great as applied to men is relative in meaning, and there is no denying that some of the great men of former days would be regarded as ordinary men to-day (Mukashi no daijin wa ima no bonnin taru mono mo arō). Owing to the great progress of society the appearance of men who tower over the heads of their fellows has become increasingly rare. There is no saying that a great religious teacher will not be given to the world, but as it will not do to depend on an uncertainty of this kind, ordinary folks like ourselves should each strive to further the interests of religion in his own way. In Western countries there seems at present to be little expectation of the appearance of a great religious teacher. The various sects and parties, with the exception of the conservative school of thinkers, are busy recasting their creeds. Liberty of thought in the religious world is far more common now than it was some years ago. There is still a certain amount of persecution in some quarters. But public opinion condemns it unequivocally and is invariably on the side of the persecuted.

There is one particular in which very little religious progress seems to be going on in Western lands. The Sects do not unite, though they undoubtedly have common ground on which to join hands. In this country we have never been attached to sectarianism and hence its abolition ought to prove easy to us. It is a great drawback to us to be divided up into a number of different sects in the way we are now, and there is no thoughtful man among us but desires to see a union at any rate among the progressive members of the Church of Christ in this land.

Numerous are the mistaken notions entertained by Christians. One of these it is worth while to mention here. It concerns the actual intellectual and moral condition of different members of the human race. It is proclaimed as one of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity that all men are equal in the sight of God and as members of Christ's Church. But it is plain that this theory is only partially true. There are numerous radical differences between men in different states of enlightenment. They may profess to believe in the same God, but in reality they do not, as the conceptions of each mind concerning the Deity are so affected by intellectual capacity or incapacity as to have hardly anything in common. The same religion for all people is no more possible than the same God for all people. There is a religion for superior minds and a religion for inferior minds; a religion for the weak and a religion for the strong (Yue ni ikanaru shūkyō tote bammin ni zenzen dōyō de aru hazu wa nai. Sono uchi yūsha, kyōsha no shūkyō mo, ressha, jakusha no shūkyō mo shōji kitarazaru wo yenu). At the present time there is greater need for a religion for the strong than for the weak, for the intellectual rather than for the unintellectual. If religion can not be rendered equal to the task of guiding the minds of the most intelligent members of society, if it is never to rise above the level of helping the weak and the ignorant, it will turn out to be a very poor thing. The notion that the same kind of religious teaching will suit divers states of mind and the different stages of enlightenment through which men pass is evidently false. Religious teachers must take note of the wide gulfs which separate men from each other, in order to adapt their doctrines to the needs of each.

Captain Okada thinks that there is an essential difference between the way of salvation as preached by Shaka Muni, and as preached by Jesus Christ. The main object placed before the seeker for salvation by Buddhist teachers is deliverance from trouble, cessation of conflict, entire ease of mind, superiority to and isolation from the turmoil and stress of human life, but Christianity, on the other hand, teaches that life is one series of battles with adverse circumstances of all kinds, and as long as it lasts there can be no real rest, no relaxation of energy. We have to work out our own salvation with fear and trembling. The life of the Christian is one in which hardship must be expected, and all that is to be obtained from the Christian religion requires strenuous efforts on the part of Christians. In the religion of Shaka dependence on outside help is rendered most prominent, and dependence on self-help is not insisted on in the same way as we find it in Christian teaching.

Coming to the subject of delusions, Captain Okada observes that those who are victims of delusion or illusion are seldom aware that they have gone astray. The fact is that everything is so mixed in this world of ours and we are all so subject to the influence of our environment that unconsciously we are swayed this way or that. Thorough enlightenment is hard to obtain. To separate the good from the bad, to distinguish between right and wrong is often extremely difficult.

Captain Okada concludes his article by insisting on attaching greater importance to intellectual development than has hitherto been the case with Christian teachers. He desires to see Christianity become the religion of the most intelligent and the strongest members of society. In order to fulfil the function of serving as a guide to the intellectual aristocracy of the world, Christianity, he considers, must be rendered more philosophical and be brought into harmony with modern science and modern thought.

In the July number of the To-A-no-Hikari appears a longish article from the pen of Mr. K. Akashi entitled "The Future of Christianity;" the substance of which we give below. In the United States among a population of over eighty million people not more than forty million have any connection with the Churches. It is true to say that among those who go to church the majority do so not on account of the preaching but from other attractions the churches have to offer, the chief of which is music. In some cases organists are paid higher salaries than pastors. Now, though there is much that is refining and soothing in music, it certainly is not religion nor is it connected with any set of doctrines taught. To listen to music is a pleasure, but is pleasure the chief object churchgoers should have in view in attending a place of worship? If people neither assemble to worship God nor to be instructed by the preacher, they can not be said to be religious. The fact is that knowledge has advanced so much on all subjects that nowadays many well educated laymen are quite as well versed in the subjects on which preachers discourse as Ministers of the Gospel. The Laymen's movement in the States is one of the results of prevailing opinion on this subject.

In Japan there is a great dearth of public speakers who have the ability to interest audiences week after week on the platform or in the pulpit. Christianity is largely dependent on preaching. By its means it manages to instruct and enlighten its converts in a way that the Buddhists fail to accomplish. But Christian pastors find it extremely difficult to keep up the interest of their flocks Sunday after Sunday. This can only be done by the study of modern thought and its tendency. What keeps people away from church in this country and in the West is the fact that nowadays men generally no longer hold the views propounded by orthodox preachers. Concerning the universe, God, man, the Bible and Christ men's ideas have all changed, and it is strictly maintained by advanced thinkers in Christendom that orthodox theology does not represent Christ's actual teaching. Enlightened Christian pastors are well acquainted with the progress religious thought has made. They learn this from the books to be seen in their libraries. But do they as a rule preach what they know? By no means. They are afraid to do it lest they should encourage scepticism in any of their hearers, and so they go on repeating the old meaningless shibboleths. The ideas they entertain in their studies and those they preach in the pulpit are totally at variance with each other (Benkyō-shitsu no kare to sekkyō-dan-jō no kare to wa sono shisō ga zenzen koto natte oru). They utter what they know to be false as a means of saving their flocks from unbelief. It was to this that Bishop Brooks referred shortly before his death when he told certain Christian ministers that they must know that they had a biblical faith which they did not reveal to their flocks. We have ministers of this kind in this country. There are Presbyterians and there are Methodists of this sort known to me. One Methodist preacher* is in the habit of letting the world know of his real sentiments now and again, which are Unitarian in character. (Oriori sono toku tokoro ga shinjitsu sono shinzuru tokoro de, shikamo Unitarian shisō-teki de aru). When this was pointed out in the columns of the Japan Mail, this gentleman was at once called to account by a certain missionary for his heterodoxy. Whereupon he said that the utterances quoted represented the opinions of other people and not his own. "A strange answer forsooth, and one that is enough to cast doubt on the sincerity of the man who gave it" (Myōnaru kotae de aru. Shikamo kore wa sono hito no seijitsu wo utagau no ichi dai jijitsu to naru). One is astounded at the flippancy displayed on this occasion in such a serious matter as a man's inner religious convictions. Tactics of this kind constitute one of the greatest causes of the dissatisfaction felt by worldly people with Christian preaching to-day. (Kono keiko ga tashukani sejin wo shite dendōsha no sekkyō ni tai shite fuan wo idaku no jūdai-na genin de aru).

Some little time ago, continues Mr. Akashi, I held a conversation with one of the leading pastors of the Kumiai Kyōkai, in the course of which he remarked:—We have a great many old people in our church and so for some time I never felt at liberty to give the congregation my own thoughts unreservedly, for fear of unsettling the faith of these old Christians. But on sounding some of them I found that they were far more advanced in thought than I had supposed, and that my anxiety on their behalf was quite uncalled for. And so after that I preached the doctrines of the new theology without reserve. This was unquestionably the right course to pursue for what Christians are there in this country that are so blind, bigoted and superstitious and so chained to orthodoxy that they cannot be told the truth? That there are men among us who are prepared to utter lies for God's sake (Kami nō tame ni kyogen wo haku) is one of the reasons why people keep away from our Christian places of worship. That they should absent themselves from the churches where such pastors officiate is only right and proper. We shall continue this subject in our next Summary.

VISCOUNT SONE.

Viscount Sone's illness is steadily developing dangerous symptoms. He now obtains relief solely from anodyne injections. The only hopeful symptom is that the temperature remains comparatively low.

RUSSIA AND THE CONVENTION.

(From our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

St. Petersburg, July 9.

The Russo Japanese Convention will be published simultaneously here and at Tokyo. It is rumoured to-day that on the back of this Convention is an understanding that Russia will acquiesce in the Japanese annexation of Korea, and Japan guarantees Russia's position in Manchuria. The rumour on the face of it emanates from the now customary source of interesting stories detrimental to Russia—those "diplomatic circles" to be found in the neighbourhood of the Embassies of the Germanic Powers. The confident assertions of some German papers to the effect that the Convention is little better than a desperate expedient to stave off yet a little longer the inevitable war between two "natural enemies" merely excites a smile in well-informed quarters. It should be remembered that Japan offered her alliance to Russia before she offered it to Great Britain and only the cumbrous and dilatory methods of the Russia of those days and the fatal division of authority, prevented an arrangement being come to. The present Convention is not an alliance, though there seems no particular reason for doubting in this case, as in the case of other Conventions in which Russia is concerned, that it might develop into an alliance under the hostile influence of pressure from without.

Nor is it correct to say that the Convention is aimed at China. There are no outstanding questions between Russia and China that are of vital interest, and no occasion therefore exists for Russia to arm herself with a new instrument pointed in any way at China. Indeed, Russia is willing to show that her age-old friendship for China is still strong by encouraging Chinese ambitions in the direction of economic development. While unable to admit the proposed Chinchow-Aigun Railway as being utterly fatal to her own interests, both economical and imperial, Russia is willing to assist the building of a Chinese line through Mongolia to link up with her Great Siberian Railway. This is a not inconsiderable sacrifice of selfish interests and should suffice to prove to China that the old feelings of neighbourliness are still unimpaired. But the proposal put forward by Senator Knox on behalf of the United States could only have been regarded as a feasible proposition if Russia had been a second or third rate Power reduced to a state of spiritless dejection. It is a mistake to suppose, as many do who listen to the suggestions of those "diplomatic circles" above referred to, that Russia has been crippled and beaten to earth by all she has gone through in the past decade, that she is weakened by the new institutions slowly developing the forces needed for secure government, that she has so many internal troubles on hand, with Finland, Poland, the Caucasus etc., as to be a quantité négligeable in international affairs of the first importance. Russia is made up of many nationalities, and they are not unlike some families, always bickering and snapping: thanks to the new institutions and ideas, the Duma and the press-freedom, these squabbles are now become the public property of the world. But there is another side that is often lost sight of. Russia has never yet in history fought a war with the body-weight of the nation behind the blows struck by her armed forces. The next war will be inspired by those feelings of national interests, national purpose, national ambitions that win more fights than any generalship. It is very often precisely the most divided and quarrelsome households that show the most dangerous front to outside interference. There is every reason to believe that Russia belongs to this category. The Convention signifies "hands off!" in Manchuria, with a reservation regarding the treaty rights of China. But as for America and her most prominent backer in recent attempts to trouble the waters again in the Far East, she is advised to abandon the task of urging on China the construction of railways with a maximum political, and minimum economic, significance. If America really means what she says in her assurances to Russia that her objects in this part of the world are purely economic and commercial, Russia would be glad to see some demonstration of her sincerity in the building for China of other roads.—there is ample room for choice—that might serve the economic interests of China and of Russia as well. What is wanted is lines that would serve as feeders for the trunk lines in Manchuria belonging to Russia and Japan. Here is a legitimate field for American-Chinese enterprise. But it leaves out Germany, which, properly viewed, might be only an additional recommendation.

THE WEATHER.

The meteorological authorities predicted a storm on the 27th or on the 28th inst., but in this case their forecast seems to be defective. There has been rain enough and more than enough up to the present, and though the doyo season opened so propitiously, it is beginning now to be felt that more continuous sunshine is badly needed by the farmers.

On the 21st instant, the first day of the doyo season, the weather was fine in Kyushu and the central part of the main island, while it was cloudy in the other parts. In Tsuruga districts there was some rain. Throughout Japan the south wind blew, strongly in Kyushu. The temperature fell in the Hokkaido, but generally speaking it went up in the other districts. In Yokohama the thermometer registered 91.9° F. So high a temperature on the first day of the doyo season has never been experienced since 1898.

According to the report of the Meteorological Station of this prefecture, a low atmospheric pressure was felt on Monday morning in the south-west of Hachijojima and a violent wind blew over the island. On the other hand a high pressure area developed off the east of the Hokkaido. In consequence of the Hachijojima depression, the atmospheric pressure in the Tokyo-Yokohama district was so much affected that a strong wind began to blow about 10 a.m. on Monday, lasting till 7 p.m. In the afternoon it rained from time to time more or less heavily. The wind was always in a north-easterly direction, and it was strongest at one o'clock in the afternoon, the velocity being 13.7 metres per second. On Tuesday the rainfall was much heavier at intervals compared with the preceding day, while the force of wind was not so strong as it was on Monday. The precipitation of rain measured 29.4 mm. at 2 p.m. A little past 2 p.m. several peals of thunder were heard to the N.N.E.

According to the observations of the Imperial Meteorological Observatory, a hurricane is raging to the east of Loochoo and Oshima, and is proceeding towards the north-west. Storms are expected in Kyushu and Kwansai provinces, and strong winds with occasional showers in the provinces east of the Kyoto and Osaka districts. The weather will be alternately cloudy and fine in the Hokkaido, whereas in the Tokyo-Yokohama district it will be generally fine.

THE ASSASSIN OF PRINCE ITO.

In a report of an address by Rev. Mr. M. Uyemura who came back recently from a tour in Manchuria and Korea, we find the following interesting item.

"I happened to be a passenger in the same ship with the chief judge of the Supreme Court of Manchuria who is a man from Kochi Ken, and openly declared that he does not like Christianity. He is said to have personally examined An Jukon, assassin of Prince Ito, and praised him greatly, as well as proved that he was an honest and extraordinary man.

"Just at the time when the case was pending a Catholic priest contributed an article to the Japan Gazette denying that An Jukon was a member of the Catholic Church, but the Judge who examined him was deeply impressed by the manifestation of his Christian faith.

"When I was at Port Arthur, a Japanese advocate called on me to inquire into Christianity. He was the man who pleaded for An Jukon. Just on the day previous to his execution the advocate, having no more suitable words to salute him, said to him merely as a matter of courtesy." I will see you again in the Kingdom of Heaven."

"An Jukon answered him seriously "Yes, I hope so, but it needs a change in your condition to meet in Heaven. It is all right with me as I am Christian, but how is it with you? If you do not yet believe in Christ you must not neglect it, but prepare for it."

"Having personally seen the great faith of this man who was so soon to die, and who looked upon death as going back to his own home, the advocate was greatly surprised at such a result of his conviction. From that time, he became anxious about religion and abstained from wine and began to attend the Church service.

"While I was in Korea, a host of the house said to me that he had read a secret document, which was written by An Jukon in the prison giving some account of his parents and the history of his own conversion. The composition and contents are excellent; and it shows that he was a man of extraordinary spirit and burning faith. It is said that this composition is kept secret because it might create a disturbance among the Koreans should it be published."

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

On the morning of the 21st inst. a collision between a subsidiary engine and a passenger train occurred in the compound of Jinmochi Station on the O.ou line. Thirteen persons were more or less seriously injured. The accident is said to have been due to the carelessness of an inexperienced stoker, who was set to act for a moment for the driver in charge.

Another railway accident took place at Osaka Station the same morning, when a goods train ran on to the wrong line and dashed into some unoccupied carriages, which were made to strike with great violence against a brick fence near a signal post. These carriages were much damaged and two persons by the post were seriously injured.

In the first place they discussed the question of leasing the gas works and that of a municipal electric tramway. KOBE YACHTSMEN IN DISTRESS.

A party of local yachtsmen met with a rather exciting experience yesterday afternoon, says the Kobe Herald of the 27th inst., an experience which might easily have had a tragic outcome. At a little after five, Messrs. W. Neill, A. R. Macqueen and J. D. Abell, with a sloop, started out for a short sail in Mr. Neill's yacht, the Abunai. It was their intention to go out as far as Wada and there have a bathe. As a nasty sea was running, it was decided to put into the Mitsu Bishi cumber. There they had their dip, and while the men were still in the water, it was noticed that the weather was rapidly growing worse, so it was decided to turn back with all haste. Beating back to Kawasaki the boat shipped a lot of water and it was thought best to run back. Before this could be done a big sea struck the boat and she rapidly filled and sank in Hiogo Bay. The men hung on to whatever they could, and their cries soon drew the attention of a Nippon Yusen Kaisha launch, which went to their rescue and picked them up. They were in the water fully 15 minutes. Mr. Neill, who was not fully dressed, lost all his clothes. Beyond a few small articles including watches, glasses and keys, no serious damage was sustained. The party may congratulate themselves on getting off so cheaply. The Abunai, we understand, lies in 4½ fathoms of water.

CORRESPONDENCE.

JAPAN'S FINANCE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Under the above heading in this morning's issue of your paper you have favoured the public with a translation from the columns of the Nippon Shimbun of a statement of Japanese finance, attributed to an official source, but as there are some statements not quite clear, it will enhance the obligation of your readers if you can enlighten them on the following points:—

After quoting, under Table B, figures for redemptions that took place at the end of May and June this year, Table C goes on to say that yen 50,000,000 of 5 per cent. Bonds are to be redeemed after July, no mention being made of the large quantity of 5 per cent. Imperial Bonds (Goburis) which are down for redemption on the 30th inst.

Table C further states that a second redemption of Tobacco Monopoly Bonds to a value of 34,000,000 yen is to take place this year. Can you say when the first redemption of Tobacco Bonds took place? To prove there is something wrong in this statement, it is a matter of fact that the three different issues of Tobacco Monopoly Bonds never aggregated such an amount, the total issue being under 15,000,000 yen.

The balance of unredeemed second Exchequer Bonds and all Tobacco Bonds of the B issue, have to be redeemed this year, as they are actually due, and it would be a matter of interest for holders to know at what date they are to expect payment.

Yours truly,

Tokyo, July 28, 1910.

FINANCIER.

THE OWNERSHIP OF THE CAMP HILL ROAD.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

DEAR SIR,—As no one seems to have contravened my opinion, expressed in two previous letters in the columns of your valuable paper, that that part of the Bluff road from the foot of Camp Hill to the corner opposite No. 110 is the personal property of the Kirin Beer Brewing Co., I am now fain to believe that such is really the case, and would therefore suggest to the Municipal Authorities that this part of the road be called "Munich Boulevard" or "Pilsner Avenue" as a graceful and appropriate tribute to the high and mighty company and to the truculent coolies who dominate it.

Yours very truly,

Yokohama, July 28th, 1910.

BICYCLIST.

RESIDENT-GENERAL VISCOUNT TERAUCHI, with his family and suite, left Bakan early on the 21st inst. for Fusan on board the warship Yakumo.

The officials and strikers met yesterday evening and there is good hope of a settlement.

THE RAILWAY STRIKE.

London, July 22.

The amalgamated society of railway-men has refused to support the strikers financially. The men are most obdurate. The rejection of peace overtures has deepened the impression that the shunting incident was a pretext for ventilating other complaints. The strenuous efforts of the Railway Company have secured an improved service.

A QUESTION OF TAXATION.

Later.

Replying to a deputation with reference to the double income-tax paid by companies who have their headquarters in England and who are operating in the Colonies, Mr. Lloyd George said that a concession would mean a tremendous inroad into the Treasury. The whole question was whether the Motherland or the Colonies should surrender the tax. Until an arrangement was concluded, he thought it hard that England should be asked to surrender her rights.

THE "PLUVIOSE."

CAUSE OF THE DISASTER.

As a result of the inquiry into the sinking of the French submarine Pluviose, it is considered that fire took place owing to a short circuit before collision with a Channel steamer and that the crew were asphyxiated and not drowned. The submarine was probably not under control at the time of the collision.

A message from the King was read, welcoming the Japanese guests in the most cordial terms and assuring them that he always treasured the memory of his visit to Japan in 1881.

Sir Edward Grey, in proposing the toast of The Mikado, said that the Russo-Japanese Agreement is nowise impaired, but on the contrary materially contributed to secure, the original policy of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, the maintenance of peace. The renewal of the Alliance had been amply justified.

Prince Tokugawa replied to the toast.

RUSSIA AND THE "OPEN DOOR."

London, July 24.

The German paper Vossische draws attention to the recent semi-official Russian announcement that the Russian Government is considering the introduction of a transport duty on foreign goods despatched to the Far East via the Siberian Railway. The journal asks whether this implies the intention of Russia to hamper foreign trade in Manchuria, or is this the first consequence of the innocent Russo-Japanese Agreement opening the door to all nations.

A SENSIBLE PLAN.

London, July 25.

Berlin.—The Socialist organ Vorwaerts, in announcing that the Government intends to introduce another Navy Bill in 1912 after the elections to the Reichstag have taken place, urges a mighty agitation in order to induce the Government and the Reichstag to adopt the alternative policy of an understanding with Great Britain.

THE ATTACK ON SPANISH EX-MINISTER.

The outrage against Senor Maura was doubtless in revenge for his severe repression of the revolt in 1909.

TURKEY AND THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE.

The forthcoming visit of the Turkish Grand Vizier to Austria has evoked much speculation in the Austro-German Press as to the possibility of a rapprochement between Turkey and the Triple Alliance in order to offset the Russo-Japanese Agreement. "THE TIMES" ON FREE TRADE.

London, July 26.

A statement by the Tariff Commission has been issued, showing the injurious effect of the new Japanese tariff on British trade. The Times, in an article, considers it extraordinary that a highly intelligent and progressive Oriental people agrees with Western people in absolutely repudiating the glorious doctrines of free-trade, and, even more extraordinary, that both prosper amazingly upon this repudiation.

THE QUESTION OF PREFERENCE TO BRITISH COLONIES.

During the discussion on the Budget resolutions in the House of Commons, Mr. Fitzalan Hope (C., Sheffield) moved the reduction on the duty on tea grown in the Empire to four-pence a pound as an experiment in preference to the Colonies. The motion, however, was rejected by 188 to 145 votes.

THE ABSCONDING CASHIER.

INDIA AND CHINA.

TREATY RELATIONS AND THE OPIUM QUESTION.

London, July 27.

In the Indian Budget debate in the House of Commons, the Hon. E. S. Montagu, Secretary to the India Office, said that the treaty with Bhutan furnished evidence of the Government's determination not to allow foreign interference with Nepal, Sikkim and Bhutan, and he was glad that those States shared the determination. As regards Tibet the Government made it clear to China that they would require strict conformity with the Anglo-Tibetan Convention of 1904 and the Anglo-Chinese Agreement of 1906. Assurances had been received from the Chinese Government which left no room for fear regarding its good faith.

Referring to the Opium question, Mr. Montagu said that China claimed she had reduced her output by more than three-tenths. No absolute proof of this contention existed, but there was no reason to doubt it. His Majesty's Government accordingly waived the production of statistical proofs and offered China an extension of the agreement for three years more.

With reference to the suggestions to shorten the period, China herself suggested a decennium, and did not suggest reduction. Any alteration would involve serious administrative and financial considerations.

The Government was examining in a friendly spirit America's tentative programme for an opium conference at the Hague, but could not agree to any discussion of Great Britain's diplomatic relations with China. It was also desirable to know whether the Powers were willing to deal with the exportation of morphia and cocaine to the East.

The Exhibition, he said, greatly impressed the English with the patriotic spirit of Japan.

Prince Tokugawa replied.

REPORT ON THE NEW JAPANESE TARIFF.

London, July 25.

The British Tariff Commission has issued a report on the effect of the Japanese tariff on British trade. It points out that the decreases are few and the increases large. Numerous cotton goods are heavily penalized. It is stated that there is reason to anticipate the exclusion from Japan of £1,000,000 worth of British goods, covering a wide range. Lancashire and Yorkshire commodities are adversely affected. Anxiety is caused by the power of the Executive to alter the specific rates by giving six months notice, without consulting Parliament.

THE "IKOMA."

Later.

Baron Oura has entertained the officers of the Ikoma at a reception. Afterwards the crew were feted at Gravesend and races between ship's boats took place. The men subsequently marched to London, with military bands playing.

"THE TIMES" ON THE JAPANESE TARIFF.

The Times, commenting on the Japanese tariff, says that Great Britain has no advantages to offer Japan and consequently Japan has none to offer England. The tariff is not the result of any desire on Japan's part to treat England harshly. It is solely to promote Japan's well-being. The journal points out that England should follow the example of others by instituting a tariff.

Toronto.—Captain Benier, who is navigating the steamer Arctic towards the Pole via Labrador, has been ordered by the Government to attempt the North-west passage, ending the voyage at Victoria.

"THE TIMES" ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Later.

The Times points out that Mr. S. Montagu, in expounding the Indian Budget in the House of Commons, would have been well advised to abstain from claiming a revulsion of Indian feeling in favour of Great Britain. The journal recalls a similar statement made by Lord Minto and Lord Morley as being justified.

THE "IKOMA."

The officers of the Ikoma gave an "At Home" on board to 500 guests, including Ambassador Kato, Prince Tokugawa, Messrs. Yanadzu, Takata, Seki, Admiral Fremantle, and Sir John Alexander Cockburn.

(PUBLISHED BY THE NAVAL DEPARTMENT.)

THE LOSS OF THE "TETSUREI MARU."

July 24, 10.45 p.m.

The S.S. Tetsurei Maru has run ashore near Chuk-do Island in the Mokpho offing. Her passengers number 246, the foreigners being the British Consul at Osaka and one Russian. Forty have been landed. Nothing is yet known of the rest.

July 25, 3.16 a.m.

Judging from the various reports hitherto received, all seem to have been saved. The British Consul is on his way to Japan by the Kamishimo Maru.

We left Chemulpo at noon on the 24th to render assistance, and we encountered a thick fog which lasted from 2 p.m. on that day until 9 a.m. on the 25th. Thus we were delayed 7 hours, and at half-past noon on the 25th we reached the scene of the Tetsurei's disaster. Search was made, and we found that the ship had sunk completely, no part of her being above water. Among her six boats, one reached Ui Island and another Kadok Island, whence their passengers, over 40 in number, were sent to Mokpho. Nothing is known on the other four boats. Having received a report that the Mayasan Maru had gone ashore at Daiheuksan Island, we proceeded thither, leaving to the Mishima, which had come from Saseho, the duty of continuing the search for the Tetsurei Maru's boats.

At 6 p.m. on the 25th we reached Daiheuksan Island and commenced to investigate. We found that on the 21st instant at 12 p.m. the Mayasan Maru had run on that island in the Chishima archipelago at low water, but had been only slightly injured. Having discharged her cargo, she floated off on the afternoon of the 25th and set out for Mokpho. Her crew of 48 were all safe. On this island also there were no signs of anyone belonging to the Tetsurei Maru.

The Mishima reports that at noon on the 26th she met four patrol-boats in the Koje Island waters, and learned from them that the Tetsurei Maru launched 6 boats containing 180 persons, all of whom seem to have been saved. But the others who remained in the steamer are missing. The Mishima then continued her search at Chuk Island and elsewhere.

The Commander of the Yodo reports:—According to intelligence received at Mokpho on the 26th instant, two boats reached Kasa Island, two made Ili Island, and one each reached Kal and Ninshi Islands. These 6 boats have been found. All the 1st and 2nd class passengers have been saved, all the 3rd class with the exception of 32, and among those rescued are 36 of the crew. Those missing probably went down with the steamer. The strange thing is that not one body has been washed ashore.

IT is not often that Emperor William allows himself to be snubbed, but, remarks M.A.P., he did on one occasion last summer. The Kaiser was on board the Hohenzollern, which was entering a German port on the North Sea. The Imperial yacht took a pilot, "and this authority posted himself at the wheel." The Emperor, who regards himself as a perfect master of steering, stationed himself in the vicinity of the pilot, and suggested giving him a hand at the wheel. The rough sea dog, not recognizing the Emperor, turned round with a snarl. "Are you pilot, or am I?" he growled. Amazed, Wilhelm II. retired crestfallen to his stateroom. But he thought better of it, and in a few minutes returned to the bridge, and in great humility laid a box of cigars beside the pilot, with the remark, "Thou art the pilot."

TAKING as text Mr. Ellis Barker's book "Great and Greater Britain," the Conservative and Protectionist Kreuzzeitung indulges in a paean of triumph on "the decay of Britain and flourishing progress of Germany." The journal says the mounting yield of the British income tax is utterly deceptive and Consols are only kept up by Government support. Taxation in England in 1908 amounted to £4 15s. 10d. per capita, in Germany to £2 8s. 2d. Emigrants leave Britain by the 100,000, German emigrants are counted by tens of thousands. The Germans have in the savings banks nearly four times as much as the Britons. The journal says that the explanation of these evils is largely to be found in Free Trade and the depopulation of the countryside.

THE total number and tonnage of vessels built in private yards in Germany amounted in 1909 to 814 ships (aggregating 327,230 tons), whilst there were 900 vessels, of 279,743 tons, in 1908, and 333 vessels, of 208,555 tons, in 1868. The increase in the size, expressed in registered tons, it will be noticed, is far smaller than the increase in the number of vessels. The 143 merchant vessels constructed abroad in 1909 to German orders had a total tonnage of 67,477 tons, while the 166 vessels built in 1908 registered 91,812 tons. The number of river boats ordered abroad was almost the same in the two years—19 in 1909 and 18 in 1908; but the average tonnage had increased in this case, total tonnages being 3222 for 1900 and 1135 for 1908.

QUEEN MARY, who has just received six more fragments of the Cull nan diamond, is much more fortunate than was Queen Victoria at the time of her accession. The Duchess de Dino mentions it as a grievance that at that time Her Majesty had no diamonds. The diamonds belonging to Queen Adelaide, the wife of William IV., were the property of the Crown of Hanover, and were claimed by the Duke of Cumberland (between whom and his niece no love was lost) when, on Queen Victoria's accession, the Thrones of Great Britain and Hanover were separated. That deficiency of adornment, of course, attached to Her Majesty in her personal, and not her constitutional, capacity; for the State Crown glitters with gems of purest ray serene. The crown made for Queen Victoria's coronation in 1838 contained nearly 2,800 diamonds, 377 pearls, 17 sapphires, 11 emeralds, and five rubies. It weighed nearly three pounds and a quarter, which was two pounds less than George the Fourth's. Queen Alexandra's coronation crown contained as many as 3,688 diamonds.

MASS OF ECZEMA FROM KNEE DOWN

Suffered Intense Pain for 3 Years—Skin Inflamed and Covered with Scales—Limb Badly Swollen, with Terrible Itching and Burning.

CURED BY CUTICURA WHEN ALL ELSE HAD FAILED

"Previous to using Cuticura I suffered intense pain for three years from eczema on my leg, from the knee down. It began from a small spot the size of a penny piece and broke in a watery way over the ankles. It spread rapidly to the knee. It looked like an eruption, the skin red and inflamed and covered with a coating of scales. The leg became very swollen, with a terrible itching and burning sensation. In this way I suffered for the three years. I assure you I have tried all kinds of remedies and consulted several medical men. In fact I tried almost every kind of treatment one could mention, but all to no avail. My disease was as bad or worse than ever until I tried Cuticura. After a few applications I felt relief and I continued until cured. Now thanks to Cuticura, I can walk about with ease and comfort, the itching is gone and my leg is its normal size."

"I recommended the Cuticura Remedies to a friend who had suffered from eczema twenty-seven years. He has commenced the use of Cuticura and is rapidly getting cured. Richard Barrett, Mission to Seamen Institute, Ruperia St., Newport, Monmouthshire, England, Nov. 24, 1909."

A tablet of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment are often sufficient to effect a speedy, permanent cure when all else fails.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

A NIIGATA despatch says that the students of the Niigata Commercial School will shortly start for Vladivostok on a tour of study.

EARL GREY's term of office as Governor-General of Canada has been extended for one year. Earl and Lady Grey left Euston for Canada on the 14th ult.

THE two new Weir steamers, Luceric and Orteric, of about 11,000 tons, fitted with luxurious passenger accommodation and wireless telegraphy apparatus, are expected to leave the Clyde shortly for the Orient to engage in trans-Pacific trade for the Weir Company.

THE Department of Home Affairs has decided to establish a state reformatory. An outlay of 100,000 yen will be included in next year's Budget for the purpose.

FURTHER failures of Chinese banks are reported from Shanghai and Hankow. Foreign bankers in the former place are devising measures to maintain the equilibrium of the market.

THE Tohoku University at Sendai will be opened next year. The name of Professor Nagaoka Hantaro, Rigaku-hakushi, is mentioned as the probable appointee to the post of Directorship.

THE tramway between Kyoto and Osaka has now been opened to traffic, and the Railway Board on the 1st inst. decided to cease collecting extra fares on the Tokaido express trains between those cities.

MR. WANG, the newly appointed Chinese Minister to Tokyo, is reported to have left Tientsin on the 28th ult. by the steamer Yinkow Maru for his post. The Minister is accompanied by his fami y.

THE Korean Crown Prince who is now on a tour of inspection through the Sanyo districts, arrived on the 30th ult. at Hiroshima, after visiting the Okayama Orphanage, the noted Koraku-en, and other places of interest in Okayama prefecture.

THE mining products of Korea for 1909 were 3,845,568 yen of gold, 548,355 yen of gold dust, 4,096 yen of silver, 42,835 yen of gold and silver minerals, 2,727 yen of copper mineral, 327,613 yen of iron, and 225,865 yen of coal, making a total of 4,997,059 yen.

A NEW YORK despatch to the Asahi reports that the agreement between the Toyo Kisen Kaisha and the Western Pacific Railway Company will come into force in January next, as the contract with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company expires at the end of this year.

PRINCE TOKUGAWA, who is now staying in London, is reported to be leaving for home about the 10th proximo. After visiting places of interest in Norway and Sweden, His Highness will proceed to St. Petersburg about the middle of September, and return to Tokyo, via Siberia, a month later.

LIEUT.-GENERAL NAKAMURA who was ordered by His Imperial Majesty to proceed to Formosa in order to inquire after the health of the Japanese troops in the island, arrived at Taipeh on the 28th ult. A hearty welcome was accorded the Imperial messenger by the Japanese officials and civilians in Formosa.

ACCORDING to Russian papers a project is now being planned at St. Petersburg to establish a Russo-Japanese bank. The scheme was discussed by Baron Mitsui and some Russian capitalists, when the Japanese millionaire recently visited the Russian capital. It is reported that the scheme will materialize at no distant date.

IN anticipation of the busy traffic on the opening of the Antung-Mukden railway, the Railway Board has it in contemplation to build two vessels of each 3,000 tons or thereabouts to run between Shimonoseki and Fusan. The designs for the new ships are progressing in the Shipping Section of the Board, according to which, each vessel will be able to accommodate 40 first class passengers, and will have a speed of 15 knots an hour. Heretofore, the service between Shimonoseki and Fusan required eleven hours, which will be reduced to nine or ten by the new ships. The cost is estimated at some 18,000,000 yen. The construction will be placed with the Mitsubishi or the Kawasaki Dockyard.

JAPAN has joined the International Hygienic Exhibition to be held at Dresden in May next. The expenses for the exhibition are estimated at about 200,000 yen, of which sum over 117,000 yen will be required for the construction of buildings and about 80,000 yen for sundry expenses. The estimates will be brought forward at the next session of the Diet.

MR. HARADA TORATARO of the Yasuda Bank, Tokyo, having concluded close investigations regarding financial circles in China and Manchuria, the Bank is reported to have decided to establish branches at Shanghai, Hankow, Suchow, Kiangchow, and Ningpo. In the meantime the Third Bank and the Hundred and Thirtieth Bank will rouse themselves to action in Formosa and Korea, respectively.

THREE railwaymen were killed and the lives of 300 passengers were imperilled by the derailing of an express train from New York near Albany on the 10th ult. One passenger was cut by flying glass, but the others were uninjured. The accident was due to the express colliding with a freight train. The engine and luggage-car of the express were overturned and five coaches left the track. The fireman and luggage guard were killed instantly. The driver, who was alive when taken from the wreck, died later.

A GENERAL meeting of the Tokyo Artificial Fertilizer Company was held on the 28th ult., when an annual dividend of eight per cent. was declared. Subsequently Mr. Tsurahara, the President, explained in detail the profitability of amalgamating with the Dai-Nippon Kaishiki Kaisha, and the shareholders present unanimously consented to the provisional contract. As the result the amalgamated company will in the future carry on business under the title of the Dai-Nippon Artificial Fertilizer Company, with increased capital of 6,250,000 yen.

On the 27th ultimo a shipping accident again occurred at Port Arthur. The steamer Yasaki Maru (53 tons) which left Dairen at 11.30 on that morning, just passed the entrance of the harbour of Port Arthur, when she ran aground on a shoal. With no loss of time the Naval Station despatched the steamer Joto Maru and two steam launches to the scene. Sixty-three Chinese passengers on board the vessel where taken safely to land, and the steamer seemed to have sustained no great damage. The Yasaki Maru is on the regular line between Dairen and Port Arthur.

AN Osaka telephone message, received by the Chugai Shogyo, says that telegrams from London and New York report the establishment of a Spinning Mills Trust, with a capital of $20,000,000. The business firms concerned, however, have not received any such intelligence, and the above telegrams are open to doubt. It was several years ago that over 25,000,000 spindles were working at spinning mills in the United States, so that the total amount of capital in these companies must have been over $1,000,000,000. It need not be said that the new trust could not possibly buy all the spinning mills. In the meantime it is anticipated that there may arise a new trust for purchasing materials and selling manufactured articles. If this proves to be the case, Japan's spinning mill business will be much affected, as far as Chinese markets are concerned.

KOREA.

Friday, July 29.

Things are quiet in Seoul. No indications are visible of the signal events which were expected to follow Viscount Terauchi's arrival. The Viscount is said to be denying himself to all visitors except those who come on very important business.

The Emperor of Korea announced his intention of calling on Viscount Terauchi at the Residency-General on the 29th inst., and doubtless the visit was paid yesterday. It is understood that in taking this exceptional step His Majesty desired to convey his appreciation of the very friendly autograph letter from the Emperor of Japan which the new Resident-General carried to Seoul. At the same time, the fact is recalled that never previously, except to return the Japanese Prince Imperial's visit and to say farewell to Prince Ito on the latter's final departure from Seoul, has the Emperor of Korea visited the Residency-General.

On the 28th inst. Viscount Terauchi summoned to the Residency-General 300 high officials, Korean and Japanese, and exhorted them to discharge their duties faithfully and earnestly without regard to nationality.

The Jiji Shimpō, which has always been an earnest advocate of amalgamation, now quotes an anonymous politician, said to be well versed in Korean affairs, and attributes to him a statement that the original idea was to take the final step about the 10th of next month, but that a difficulty has occurred which will probably necessitate a postponement. That difficulty is that none of the statesmen now in Power seem inclined to accept the official responsibility of holding a portfolio at the time of amalgamation. The Prime Minister pleads his debilitated condition; the Minister of Justice recalls the unpopularity he incurred in connexion with the transfer of Police Authority, and the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce opposing amalgamation on a Japanese tone. On the other hand the Residency-General wishes to associate the Yi Cabinet with this important measure, and, in fact, it would be highly inconvenient to entrust the necessary arrangements to a new ministry. These things may cause more or less delay.

The Korean students in Tokyo are quoted by the Jiji Shimpō as claiming that no patriotic man could stand by quietly and witness the loss of their country's independence. They admit that under that conviction they have taken some steps against the annexation of Korea by Japan, but they insist that they have not in any way incited, nor do they intend to incite, ignorant recourse to violence. They believe, however, that an insurrection of some kind on the part of the literati throughout the Peninsula will certainly follow the announcement of amalgamation.

Two bands of Korean insurgents, numbering about 17 each and armed with modern rifles, are endeavouring to excite the people of Pyongan-do to revolt, but in spite of promises to respect persons and properties of their own countrymen, these rioters appear to be plundering freely.

It appears that Chentao is gradually becoming the rendez-vous of Korean malcontents. Fragments of several political associations are assembling there and are establishing communication with Vladivostock.

Saturday, July 30.

On the 29th ult., the Emperor of Korea paid his visit to the Residency-General. His Majesty was introduced to Viscountess and Miss Terauchi, and he remained about half an hour conversing on general subjects.

There is beginning to be a great deal of talk about the system of customs' dues to be adopted in Korea in the event of amalgamation with Japan. A representative of the Jiji Shimpō has interviewed Mr. Sakurai, chief of the Customs' Bureau in the Department of Finance, and has obtained from him an expression of opinion which is decidedly inconclusive. Mr. Sakurai is made to say that Korea cannot be admitted to the Japanese system without great embarrassment, and cannot be exceptionally treated without almost equal difficulty. He cites the case of saké. It is obvious that the Korean people could not possibly afford to pay anything like the tax imposed on saké in Japan, and, on the other hand, if the tax be lightened in Korea, the Peninsula will become the brewery of all Japan. Similarly, with regard to general merchandise. If the present treaties of commerce and navigation be continued in Korea's case after she becomes a part of the Japanese Empire, all imports to Japan will come viâ the Peninsula, thus paying 5 per cent. duty instead of 15. Mr. Sakurai is quoted as dwelling upon other duties, but we confess that the points made by him do not strike us as being so very formidable after all.

Sunday, July 31.

There appears to be quite a considerable movement of insurgents in western Chhollado. News comes that no less than three armed bands, consisting, respectively, of one hundred, one hundred and forty, and nine, have been seen in the neighbourhood of Mokpho and Kunsan. Some vessels of the Preventive Squadron (Keibi-tei) have been sent to the scene.

On the evening of the 30th ult. the new Resident-General gave a party for the purpose of introducing himself to the citizens of Seoul, official and private. Some three thousands persons were present, and the whole entertainment consisted in a brief speech by Viscount Terauchi, a stand-up collation, and a band of music. The extreme simplicity of the arrangements is said to have been quite striking. The Hochi Shimbun's correspondent describes the affair as having been in accordance with the "Terauchi-pattern." The Viscount, having now completed the ceremonial part of his functions on entering office, is expected to lose no time in applying himself to the practical parts.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun alleges that a movement is on foot, among the Seiyu kai politicians, to insist upon the convention of a special assembly of the Diet to discuss the Korean problem. These politicians are said to take the view that, if war were going on, or if this problem had to be solved in the immediate sequel of war, no occasion to appeal to the Diet would exist. But as everything is to be done in a peaceful and orderly manner, while at the same time the affair must be regarded as of prime national importance, it becomes, plainly, an occasion for joint action on the part of the Government and the Diet. If amalgamation is not contemplated before October or November, the ordinary session commencing in the latter month will be in sufficient time. But if there be any idea of carrying out amalgamation in August or September, it would not be right to leave to the Government an entirely free hand during such a long interval. Our Tokyo contemporary does not say whether this view is held by any of the leaders of the great party: it attributes the proposal simply to a section of the Seiyu-kai.

Baron Megata, formerly financial adviser to the Korean Government, is quoted by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun as adducing figures the gist of which is that Japan will have to put her hand in her pocket to a further extent of 10 million yen annually if she annexes Korea. The detailed figures upon which this estimate is based are given by our contemporary, but as the totals do not in every case tally with the items, we confine ourselves to a brief outline. It appears that the total income of the Korean Government at present is 24 million yen, whereof 15 millions accrue from taxation and 5 millions are obtained by loans, the remainder being contributed by Japan. On the other hand, the outlays, ordinary and extraordinary, total 24 millions, and in addition to this the Residency-General, the prisons, the army and the navy, all together cost Japan, 8½ millions, besides which she spends 9 millions in extraordinary outlays. Baron Megata thinks that Japan would be obliged to put up another 10 millions if she annexed Korea, always remembering that the main purpose of annexation would be to develop the resources of the Peninsula and enable the nation to defray its own outlays.

The problem of the Yangpan continues to be discussed. It seems to be thought that to provide for these people by the simple process of handing to them a quantity of pension bonds would be to encourage their already indolent disposition. Hence, the better plan would be to devise some bread-winning industry in which they might take part. One project is to establish sericultural institutions, including filatures, and having equipped them thoroughly, to hand them over to the Yangpan as a source of livelihood.

Monday, August 1.

On the 1st inst. Viscountess Terauchi and her daughter were received in audience by the Empress of Korea.

The Hochi Shimbun has a telegram from Seoul which says that the Emperor's visit to the Residency-General on the 29th ult. has been misconstrued by a section of the Korean people. They do not recognize that His Majesty merely returned the call previously made at the Palace by Viscount Terauchi, and they are indignant because the latter has not yet returned the Emperor's visit.

There continues to be much talk about amalgamation. The question now chiefly discussed is the method of procedure. The Hochi Shimbun, speaking in the name of an anonymous high official, says that the programme adopted by the French in Madagascar and by the Americans in Hawaii seems most appropriate. As for the treaties between Korea and the foreign Powers, they necessarily cease and determine from the moment that annexation becomes an accomplished fact. Thus, extra territorial jurisdiction, which is acquired under these treaties, comes to an end with the treaties. But, of course, this principle does not hold in the matter of vested rights enjoyed by foreigners in the Peninsula: these will be fully respected. With regard to the customs' tariff, that too, being a matter of treaty, would cease de facto to be operative, but there would not be any actual change of the tariff: it would be re-enacted by Japanese Imperial rescript. There would, however, be a special provision to prevent imports of merchandise to Japan via Korea. Our contemporary seems to think that this programme would lower the rates in the case of a few staples, such as aniline dyes, inasmuch as these rates are smaller in the Japanese tariff than in the Korean. But we do not profess to understand how the Korean tariff is to be at once re-enacted in its present form and revised into the Japanese form.

Meanwhile, the Yangpan problem attracts much attention. These folks have no parallel in the body-politic of any other country. They came into existence 500 years ago, and were then regarded merely as a privileged class, having a prior claim to be appointed to office, but not receiving any emoluments unless they were actually serving the State. The exact number of the Yangpan is not known, but it probably amounts to 40,000 or 50,000. To saddle the country with the payment of interest on pension-bonds handed to these idlers, would be an injustice to the nation, and to leave the Yangpan unprovided for would be to add a large contingent to the ranks of the disaffected. Thus, the problem is decidedly difficult. As for the Throne, it appears to be generally thought that the shadow, at all events, of Imperialism must be preserved.

The Emperor of Korea has conferred the First-class Order of Merit on Viscount Sone. We may here mention that the Fuji Shimpō publishes a rumour to the effect that the use of radium has proved so efficacious in Viscount Sone's case that his life is no longer in danger.

Tuesday, August 2.

It is evident that newspaper correspondents in Seoul are watching, with keen attention, every incident, trivial or cardinal. Thus we read, in the telegraphic service of the Mainichi Dempo, that on the 31st ult. the Prime Minister Mr. Yi, pretexting a desire to visit his private residence, proceeded thither with a very small retinue, and on his arrival telephoned for Mr. Pak, Minister of Home Affairs and Mr. Cho, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce. With these two colleagues, Mr. Yi is said to have held a long conference, which furnishes much proof for conjecture.

The same correspondent is sufficiently courageous to formulate an analysis of the attitude of the Korean nation towards amalgamation. He briefly dismisses the lower orders by saying that the problem of earning a livelihood engrosses their attention, to the exclusion of all political topics. In the province of Pyongan, however, and in Chientao there are some unquiet elements, but as they are under strict Japanese surveillance, they are not likely to attempt anything serious. It is from the Yangpan and the literati alone, that opposition is to be expected, and how to be dealt with these recalcitrant elements, is the whole question of the hour.

Tokyo newspapers are unanimous in publishing an item of intelligence which may be supposed to have been furnished by a news agency. It speaks of amalgamation as though that measure were on the immediate tapis. We are informed that as laws issued under the authority of the reigning Sovereign will become invalid de facto so soon as annexation is announced, steps are now being taken to provide for the simultaneous re-promulgation of all these laws, with the necessary emendations. Special care will be taken to safeguard the vested rights hitherto acquired by foreigners in the Peninsula.

The above is a paragraph which any one of sufficient courage might sit down to indite at any moment without much fear of being proved a false prophet, but evidently it must not be read in the sense that amalgamation is about to take place to-day or to-morrow.

The Chuo Shimbun has a curious appreciation of the mental attitude of foreign countries towards the question of amalgamation. It opines that people who found in the murder of a missionary a sufficient pretext for the seizure of a friendly Power's territory, have no reason to be surprised if the assassination of the Empire's leading statesman produces a similar result. The obvious reference here is to Germany in Shangtung. But we may remind our Tokyo contemporary of the truism that two wrongs do not make a right. It would be a sacrilege to the memory of Prince Ito to convert his terrible end into a pretext for gratifying international ambition. The Chuo is on much safer ground, we venture to think, when it refers to the general trend of events during the past 15 years and to the various treaties, conventions and ententes concluded in that interval. All these point plainly enough to Japan's supremacy in Korea, and it may be taken as axiomatic that no Western Power will raise a finger to save Korea from the good fortune of becoming a part of the Japanese Empire.

Wednesday, August 3.

On the 2nd inst. a meeting of Cabinet Ministers and high Japanese officials took place at the Residency-General. The Korean members of the Cabinet solemnly pledged themselves to coöperate with the Resident-General, and it was decided that, failing any specially important business, no further councils should be held at the Residency-General.

Again rumours are circulated about political movements on the part of Korean converts to Christianity. Thus we read that at a meeting of the Y.M.C.A. held in Seoul on the 31st ult. a very incendiary address was delivered by one of those present. Ascending the rostrum, he declared that if Japan attempted to carry out her policy of annexation, there would certainly be trouble in Seoul, and Japan would doubtless resort to armed force for the purpose of maintaining order. In that event, she might turn her hand against the Korean Christians, but if she did, she would fare badly. The assassination of even one Christian would at once evoke protests from the foreign consuls, and Japan's dream of being able to annex the Peninsula would be rudely disturbed.

The Mainichi Dempo's correspondent, who sends this report, takes care to discriminate between the foreign missionaries and these hot-headed converts. He says that among the foreign missionaries there is none so short-sighted and ignorant as to entertain such views, but undoubtedly among the Korean converts, many believe that the mantle of Christianity may be conveniently converted into political armour.

News comes from the north-west of Korea to the effect that the anti-Japanese leader, Yi Pon-yun, has fallen into disfavour with his followers. He is charged with collecting large sums of money on account of his propaganda, but the subscribers witness no results from their liberality. There is consequently talk of making away with Mr. Yi.

The police in Seoul have traced the source from which arms and ammunition have hitherto been supplied to the insurgents in Hwanghai-do, and have arrested the principal persons concerned.

Mr. Uchida Ryohei is quoted as having made some interesting remarks about the Yanpangs. He denies that they have any legalised existence whatever. They are merely a remnant of the days of patriarchal government, and the only substantial privilege that they possess is exemption from taxation. They are obsessed with a sense of their own dignity, and the idea of labour in any shape or form is utterly repugnant to them. Thus, a typical Yanpang, if he wants to write a letter, will not even grind his own ink or wet his own pen. He will have these offices performed for him by a servant. There are about 200,000 Yanpang in all, and the great majority of them are tolerably well provided for. But some are miserably poor, and as it is an inviolable principle with them that they must never beg and never toil, they often contract fatal diseases from privation. To furnish these men with the means of continuing a life of indolence would be to create conditions entirely inconsistent with an age when the survival of the fittest is the universal rule. Mr. Uchida strongly deprecates the idea of giving pension bonds or any other unearned income to the Yanpang. He recommends that some kind of employment should be found for the needy among them, and if they don't choose to work, they must take the consequences.

There continues to be much discussion about the question of customs arrangements in the event of the annexation of Korea. Rice and saké are the two staples principally spoken of. At present saké, exported from Japan to Korea, is entitled to a rebate of the monopoly tax, and can thus be sold in Korea at a moderate price. But if Korea becomes an integral part of Japan, this system will have to be changed, and then the Koreans will have to pay for their saké such a price as would make them compulsory teetotalers. With regard to rice, the Korean staple pays an import duty at present when it enters Japan, and if that duty were remitted, Japanese rice would have a powerful competitor; a result which would be very unwelcome to the former, though very pleasant to the consumer. Baron Sakatani has expressed his opinion upon these subjects, and the gist of what he says is that when amalgamation is consummated, all fiscal distinctions must cease. They may be continued for a time in a modified form as expediency directs, but they must be abolished in the long run. In the matter of financial system, however, the Baron is inclined to think that the plan pursued with regard to Formosa may be adopted in Korea's case, that is to say, a special system may be organized. He has great confidence in the future of Korea, mainly because it has no appreciable national debt, and because it possesses large resources awaiting development. He thinks that in a few years the 15 millions of Korean inhabitants will find themselves in a very different pecuniary position if they have an improved form of Government.

Thursday, August 4.

The entertainments in honour of the new Resident-General and Vice-Resident General are still going on in Seoul. On the 3rd inst. the Japanese community of that city gave an entertainment in honour of the newly appointed officials. All the arrangements are said to have been in accordance with the so called "Terauchi-pattern," which expression has come to be synonymous with austerity and economy. In his speech replying to the toast of his health, the Viscount alluded very plainly to his earnest desire that his countrymen in Korea should order their lives in accordance with codes of strict morality and avoidance of ostentation, in order to become models to be followed, not examples to be shunned.

From various reports coming to Japan since Viscount Terauchi's arrival in Seoul, it is evident that the new Resident General and the Vice-Resident General are determined to set their faces sternly against everything in the shape of dissolute or irregular conduct on the part of officials or private Japanese subjects in Korea. It is very plainly hinted that under the regime of the previous Resident-General the sound of the samisen was not infrequently heard in official buildings, and men sometimes found themselves considerably poorer or considerably richer, as the sequel of an evening spent at houses where gambling ought to be the last thing permitted. Very likely this talk is largely hyperbolic. The new broom is always supposed to sweep clean. On the other hand, there must be some ground for the stories, and, certainly, it is correct to say that such doings will not find a moment's grace at General Terauchi's hands.

It would of course be very interesting to be able to see behind the curtain at this juncture, so as to discern what measures are being taken by way of preparation for the drama which cannot now be long deferred. But it is evident that military secrecy is to be observed. Japanese officers proved conclusively, during the recent war, that if there be one thing which they can do better than another, it is to hold their peace. We can be quite sure, therefore, that nothing of what is going on in Seoul will be known by the world until the moment comes when no inconvenience will attach to general knowledge. For the rest, intelligence now sent across the wires by newspaper correspondents is of very little value. To-day they tell us that everything is quiet and that even among the Christian converts there is no movement worthy of notice; whereas yesterday they had a very different tale to recount. We possess our souls in patience.

The Kokumin Shimbun's correspondent wires that, in his opinion, a false interpretation has been given to the acts of the Korean Cabinet Ministers. Thus, the Premier has been represented as anxious to resign in order to clear his own skirts in the presence of amalgamation, and a secret meeting—as reported in our last issue—is said to have been held at his private residence, between himself and two of his colleagues for the purpose of escaping responsibility. All this is now contradicted by the Kokumin's correspondent. He represents the Cabinet as comparatively unperturbed, and as quite prepared to abide by the acts of the Resident-General. The same correspondent explains that it was a misapprehension to infer the taking of special precautions because, apparently, an exceptional number of troops and police guarded the roads on the occasion of the arrival of the Resident-General. The police were simply acting in accordance with their newly perfected organization, and if many troops were en evidence, it was because of Viscount Terauchi's military rank.

Mr. Rawabata, correspondent of the Yomiuri Shimbun, alleges that, according to recent investigation, there are in Korea no less than 32 political associations, broken up into 700 minor bodies, and comprising a membership of 463,964. These numbers are sufficiently startling, but according to this correspondent they mean very little. The associations, though undoubtedly political in character, cannot be said to have any distinct political views. Their dominant impulse is to follow wherever strength leads. They are quite persuaded that amalgamation is inevitable, and that any struggle on Korea's part to evade it would be futile. At the same time, they do not want to march in the wake of the Il Ching-hoi. They want to find some independent means of asserting their own value. Nothing else troubles them seriously.

We do not pretend to attach any importance to analyses of the above nature.

A great deal continues to be written about the difficulty of adjusting the customs arrangements, if Korea be amalgamated with the Japanese Empire; but as all this is a mere matter of manipulation, we see no reason to discuss it at length.

THE TARIFF.

Saturday, July 30.

Naturally, the telegrams from London about questions asked and answered in the House of Commons are attracting considerable attention in Japan. Summing up the views expressed by Tokyo journals, the salient features may be said to be a desire on Japan's part to come to some friendly understanding with her ally, and a conviction that the whole difficulty is due, not to any want of good-will on the part of Japan, but to special circumstances. England's exports to Japan consist mainly of manufactured goods, and as all manufactured goods are heavily taxed for the purpose of promoting domestic industry, English exporters are the chief sufferers under the new rates. That is merely an accident of the situation, and cannot justly be attributed to any design on Japan's part. The Hochi Shimbun, which has taken a very intelligent view of this problem throughout, now contends that if the principle of reciprocity were carried to its logical terminus, all British merchandise would have to be admitted free to Japan, since all Japanese merchandise is admitted free to England. But, for the matter of that, if countries were guided solely by academical considerations in forming their tariffs, free trade would be universal. However, the point to be noted is that the leading Japanese newspapers are evidently desirous of reaching a settlement which will be satisfactory to England, though unfortunately no publicist has yet been able to formulate a working basis of compromise.

Sunday, July 31.

The Mainichi Dempo professes to have made inquiries in official quarters, and thus to be in a position to deny that anything in the nature of protest has been formulated by the British Government in the matter of the tariff. It is true that Downing Street has asked Japan to furnish an explanation accompanied by her own views, but there has been nothing that can be called a protest. Our contemporary makes an interesting allegation, namely, that Japan originally approached England on the subject of a conventional tariff, but the British Government replied that it had nothing to give in exchange, and on the strength of that reply Count Komura's explanation was made in the Diet. The Mainichi Dempo thinks that the difficulty will be solved when Japan comes to negotiate for conventional tariffs with Germany and France. England will then be admitted to equality of privileges under the most favoured-nation clause. But that method does not offer any satisfactory solution. It is a matter of course that all privileges extended to any one nation become enjoyable on equal terms by every most favoured nation. It is more than doubtful, however, whether a conventional tariff with France or Germany would affect staples of prime importance to England.

Tuesday, August 2.

Mr. Wakatsuki, Vice-Minister of Finance, is credited with the opinion that the problem of the Japanese tariff will have some influence, direct or indirect, upon the question of fair trade or free trade in England. He thinks that the cause of fair trade has made steady progress among the educated classes in the United Kingdom during recent years, and that the object-lesson furnished by the Japanese incident, will have the effect of concentrating public attention upon the problem. The Vice-Minister does not predict any sudden or very salient effect, but he evidently believes that England has only to open her eyes wide enough and she will immediately recognize the disadvantage at which she has voluntarily places herself. But Mr. Wakatsuki does not hint, however remotely, at any practical exit from the situation now existing between England and Japan.

BETTING AT HORSE RACES.

The police authorities have released the persons arrested for engaging in lotteries on the Meguro Race-course. It seems to be uncertain whether this is to be interpreted as abandonment of the prosecution, or, as due to the fact that no occasion exists to detain such persons pending investigation. The incident has naturally evoked much comment. The Government has many critics, and no one can pretend to think that the Authorities have showed much foresight or practical good sense in connexion with this matter. The offence charged against the actor, Shikan, the proprietor of the Kage-tsuro, Mr. Namba, and a geisha, is that they purchased lottery tickets from a person who conducted the business on a basis of percentage. There would not, we presume, have been any fault found if this professional element had not been introduced: in other words, if the lottery had been of a purely private nature, such as is commonly organized by persons frequenting races. But so soon as a percentage was charged for the trouble of organization, the process became illegal. It is, at best, a very trivial offence, and we are disposed to agree with the critics that, if the Government expects to have horse-races entirely free from any element of gambling, an impossibility is aimed at.

FORMOSA.

Saturday, July 30.

There is no news of a conclusive nature this morning. Some execution has been done with guns posted on a high hill in the Gilan district, and there has been a conference between a party of some 40 Gaogan aborigines and the Japanese reconnoitring detachment. The Gaogan leader offered to make peace, if the Japanese agreed to abandon all further advance; or, in other words, to give up the whole purpose of their expedition. We need scarcely say that this proposal was peremptorily negatived. Thereafter, the aborigines succeeded in killing 3 of the Japanese labourers in the Gilan district.

In the Shinchiku quarter, operations have been limited to a fruitless interchange of rifle-fire; to an unproductive use of artillery, and to the laying of some wire entanglements in the face of great difficulties. On the whole, the reports may be compressed into three words, no special progress.

Sunday, July 31.

Again, there is nothing of any importance so report. Operations in the Shinchiku section of the field are confined to sharp-shooting. It is related that two aborigines were recently desecrated, in a tree, at a distance of about 70 or 80 metres, and one of them was shot on his perch. The aborigines are resorting to all kinds of devices for the purpose of impeding the progress of the Japanese wire entanglements. It would seem that a concentration of force has been effected by them in the Shinchiku region. They have drawn off largely from the Gilan quarter, and some 700 are now opposing the advance of the Shinchiku force.

Meanwhile on the 28th inst. a detachment, under the command of Lieut. Oba, succeeded in placing itself in the rear of the aborigines, who were holding the second spur on the southern face of Shinarek mountain. The battalion, under Major Seigusa, advanced immediately and took possession of the position. This is an important success, as it enables the Japanese to cut the communications of the enemy. The latter will probably struggle hard to recover the lost ground. In the above operation, the Japanese had two killed and ten wounded. On the 29th ult. a fierce encounter is reported from this part of the field, the aborigines massing all their force to drive back the Japanese, and attempting to turn the latter's flank with mounted men.

Monday, August 1.

There is no news from Formosa this morning, but we must confess that the comment of the Asahi Shimbun on this campaign does not seem to stand on the high level of perspicacity generally reached by that journal. The Asahi admits that the enterprise must now be carried to the bitter end, but it frankly expresses the opinion that General Sakuma did not fully understand the nature of the task awaiting him and that he did not take sufficient measures to understand it. Our contemporary bases this comment on the supposition that the aborigines have some special form of tactics. But have they? So far as we can see, and we have followed the movements pretty closely from the beginning, the one idea of the aborigines is to take full advantage of the facilities which their own colour and disguise furnish for concealment, and to avail themselves thoroughly of the extremely difficult topographical features of a country with every inch of which they have been familiar since their childhood. Credit the aborigines with an ordinary measure of courage, and supply them with good rifles, as well as a fair store of ammunition, and they must be expected to do exactly what they are doing. The only basis for criticising Viscount Sakuma's programme is, we venture to think, that he essayed to carry it out, in the first instance, with Aiyu only. That fact suggests that he underrated the defensive capacities of the aborigines.

Tuesday, August 2.

According to telegrams from the Asahi's correspondent, Shinarek mountain continues to be the scene of severe fighting. On the 28th ult., Capt. Sazawa's company captured the 2nd spur of the mountain. This was a substantial success, and on the following day the aborigines made a desperate attempt to recover the position. Their attack was so fierce that they succeeded in inflicting 29 casualties on the Japanese, and they were not forced to retire until the 30th ultimo when a heavy artillery fire was directed against them.

It would seem that three Japanese forces are operating simultaneously against this Shinarek position, and that the one spoken of above is the central body. The force on the Japanese right flank has found it impossible to advance, owing to the nature of the ground, but the force on the left flank, under the command of Capt. Yamai has occupied a position 700 metres up the mountain.

On the same day, 29th ult., a Japanese police officer, named Nakama, appears to have conducted a reconnaissance with 70 aborigines, of whom 8 were despatched to the camp on the top of the mountain. They appear to have peacefully interviewed the defenders, but were jeered at for submitting to the Japanese, and finally ordered to return without loss of time. They brought back intelligence that the position at the top of the mountain is fortified and strengthened in every possible way.

Wednesday, August 3.

The telegraph says that the casualties in Capt. Sazawa's force during the operations on the 28th and 29th ult. were 9 killed and 18 wounded. These were the operations which ended in the capture of the second spur on the south of Shinarek mountain.

The Gaogan aborigines are said to be working hard to persuade the other aborigines to join them. From this it is inferred that the Gaogan men are growing weary of the contest. They talk very big, but, owing to their limited numbers, it is not possible that they can hold out very long without the assistance of other tribes.

On the Shinchiku side, the troops seem to be engaged for the moment in making a clearing through the forest, and getting rid of trees which afford cover for attacks by the aborigines.

A LONDON SENSATION.

A fortnight ago London was startled by a gruesome discovery made in the cellar of a house at 39, Hildrop Crescent, Camden Town. Suspicion had fallen on an American doctor named Hawley Harvey Crippen, who had been practising for some years at various London addresses as a "Yale Tooth-specialist" and representative of Munyon's remedies. It seems that in February last Crippen took into his house Miss le Neve, a typist, and shortly afterwards circulated a circumstantial story of the departure for America of his wife, Mrs. Cora Crippen, otherwise known as Belle Elmore, a popular music-hall artiste. The announcement of Mrs. Crippen's "departure" was followed, in due course, by the "news" of her subsequent illness and death in California. It was not however till a few weeks ago that suspicion as to the truth of Crippen's story was aroused, and the first breath of doubt was sufficient, apparently, to lead to the disappearance of Crippen and the lady-typist. A search of the premises at Hildrop Crescent led eventually to the digging up of the basement cellar, when the remains of a woman's body were found. The body had been dismembered and buried in quicklime, but examination left little doubt as to its identity, and a warrant for the arrest of the absconding doctor and his typist, who it was thought would be disguised as a boy, was at once issued. Judging from a telegram in yesterday's issue of the Japan Advertiser, the guilty parties have at length been overtaken by the long arm of the law. They were arrested, according to the telegram in question, on board the steamer Montrose, at the entrance to the St. Lawrence. Our contemporary regards the telegram as "evidently referring to some New York sensation," adding that Crippen may possibly be the name of the absconding Cashier of the Russo-Chinese bank at New York. However, that defalcator's name has already been transmitted as "Wider," and, in view of the above-mentioned tragedy in London, no doubt remains as to the identity of the arrested man. His companion, of course, must be the lady-typist. Whether or not the latter was accessory to the crime it is too soon to say, but there is some satisfaction in knowing that this peculiarly cold-blooded murder is not likely to be added to the list of undiscovered crimes.

THE "JAPAN HERALD" AND GERMANY.

We have read with astonishment and some amusement a leading article in the Japan Herald attacking the Japan Mail as anti-German because we said:—"Of course, it is not possible to speak with absolute assurance on such a topic, but we feel tolerably confident that Germany will not assume an attitude in any sense unfriendly to the Russo-Japanese Convention." If such writing be "anti-German" what, we should like to know, is pro-German? The whole paragraph on which the Japan Herald bases its extravagant and most unjust charge was written with the intention of contradicting a rumour that China was planning to enlist German coöperation in a campaign against the Russo-Japanese Convention. Our comment was, in effect, that China may save herself the trouble, for Germany will not join her in such an enterprise. Thereupon the Japan Herald cries out that we are anti-German! Our local contemporary will pardon us if we say that the anti-German display is entirely on its own side. For it represents Germany in the light of a hysterical child too nervous to distinguish its friends from its foes.

CHINA.

Friday, July 29.

The removal of the celebrated Mr. Wu Ting-fan from office some time ago, followed now by the retirement of Mr. Liang Tung-yen, appears to have caused much dissatisfaction in Canton, to which city both of these statesmen belong. It is rumoured that prior to finally submitting his resignation, Mr. Liang sought the advice of the ex Viceroy Yuan Shih-ki, and received for curt reply the query "are you unacquainted with the sentiments of Prince Ching?" Liang took the hint and resigned at once.

The Hochi Shimbun has an instructive article on these events. It points out that after the retirement of Viceroy Yuan, the conduct of China's foreign affairs devolved upon Mr. Na Tung and not on Mr. Liang, the Minister who has just resigned from the Wai-puwu. Mr. Na came to Japan in 1900 to offer explanations and apologies in connexion with the assassination of Mr. Sugiyama at the time of the Boxer emeute. He has always been very friendly to this country. The successor of Mr. Liang, namely, Mr. Tsao Chia-lai, has no very definite policy so far as the public knows, but there can be no doubt about the sentiments of Messrs. Hu and Tsao, who have now been appointed to be Vice-Ministers of the Wai-puwu. Mr. Hu served as Chinese Representative in both St. Petersburg and Tokyo, and Mr. Tsao spent several years in Japan. Both of these statesmen are thoroughly friendly to Japan and Russia alike, and they form with Mr. Na Tung a triumvirate which may be relied on to interpret Tokyo's acts and words in a friendly spirit.

We find in the Hochi Shimbun a long account of a plot planned and successfully carried out by Messrs. Nakamura Yaroku (of Nunobiki-Maru celebrity), Miyazaki, Sugano, Kodama and Kondo. This band of intriguers has been for some years maintaining or pretexting close relations with anti-dynastic agitators in China, and in the late spring of the current year a scheme was elaborated to exploit the Tokyo share-market by spreading rumours of a pending disturbance in China. For this purpose several of the accomplices proceeded to China, and by simulating direct connexion with Dr. Sun and his followers, as well as cleverly manipulating the various newspaper correspondents in China, succeeded in getting reports forwarded to Tokyo from various parts of the Middle Kingdom to the effect that an extensive insurrection was on the tapis. Early in June this scheme matured, and the conspirators are said to have realized no less than 700,000 yen by selling short on the stock-market. Their proceedings were discovered by a mere accident. The police had occasion to take action against a group of men who had started a news-agency called the Nichinichi Tsushinsha, and in the perquisition that followed evidence against the principal conspirators came to light quite by chance. The story is somewhat complicated, but these outlines will suffice for our readers' information.

The Asahi Shimbun's Peking correspondent telegraphs that the Chinese newspapers in that city publish what purports to be the text of the secret agreement concluded between Japan and Russia by way of sequel to the late Convention. This secret document consists of four articles. The first is that all the region northward of the Yellow Sea shall be under the protection of Russia and Japan. The second, that the capital of Japan shall be moved to Korea. The third, that Japan shall assist in the Moscow undertaking—whatever that may mean. And the fourth, that Japan and Russia shall combine to regulate China's finance.

The correspondent infers from this publication that some one is trying to alarm the Chinese and create the impression that the partition of the Middle kingdom is imminent. The inference which we should draw is that some mischief maker is at work who estimates Chinese intelligence very cheaply. The alleged conditions can only be called grotesque, and that any Chinese newspaper should have been found to publish such phantasies seriously is not the least curious part of the affair.

Saturday, July 30.

Mr. Wang, the new Chinese representative at the Court of Japan, left Peking for this country on the 29th inst.

Signal failure seems to have attended the efforts of certain patriotic students and business-men at Nanchang to raise funds for constructing the Yangtze Railways and thus dispensing with the necessity of recourse to a foreign loan. After much agitation and canvassing, the total sum promised did not exceed 2,000 taels and the enterprise has had to be abandoned incontinently.

The telegrams suggest that rioting, on a considerable scale, has taken place at Kungan, on the borders of Hunan. The cause of the disturbance is, as usual, distress. Millions of people in China live on the verge of want, and the slightest change in normal conditions means keen suffering for these unfortunates. Nevertheless, one hears it repeatedly asserted that China is a wealthy country with immense resources.

From a place called Chanhsangtun comes news of a raid made by 20 bandits. This place being in the vicinity of the Mukden-Antung Railway, it might have been expected that Japanese subjects would have been the object of the bandits' attack. But they turned their hands against a Chinese police-station, killed one of the constables and stole a quantity of arms and ammunition. Thereafter they raided a Chinese store and got possession of a sum of 300 dollars.

It appears to be thought by many people in Shantung that responsibility for the recent riot at Laiyang is to be laid on the shoulders of the local officials, rather than on those of the Chinese inhabitants. The Peking residents of Shantung origin are reported to have held a meeting and to have resolved to petition the Shantung Local Assembly in the sense that steps should be taken to investigate the matter fully, so as to prove whether the riot was not due primarily to oppression and corruption on the part of the local officials. It cannot be denied that the provincial assemblies in China are beginning to be an important factor in the life of the nation.

Prince Tsai-Tao arrived safely at Mukden on the 30th ult. The telegrams show that a very large force of troops and police were employed to guard the route, and that the precautions taken were quite un-precedented. In the afternoon of the same day, the Prince visited the Eastern Mausoleum.

Monday, August 1.

Some time ago a special committee was appointed to consider the state of Manchurian finance which has long been been a troublesome problem. This committee's report is said to have been recently presented, but we do not gather that it included any suggestions of a drastic nature. The only immediate outcome is that a number of superfluous offices are to be abolished. Among these are comprised the Bureaux of Foreign Affairs at Tieling, Liaoyang and Antung. Considering that the annual deficit of revenue in the Three Eastern Provinces amounts to many hundreds of thousands of taels, a few reductions of the administrative personnel seems a very futile remedy. But, probably, the report contains other more vital suggestions.

It is stated that applications made by Chinese merchants for compensation in connection with the Changsha riots amount to 170,000 taels, and that as the total demands do not exceed 880,000, the foreign portion may be assumed to aggregate 710,000. It was originally proposed to pay this money by means of a foreign loan, secured by the hypothecation of certain mining privileges in the province. But as this method evoked strong expressions of dissent on the part of the rights-recovery politicians, another programme has been adopted, namely to borrow the necessary money from the Bank of China.

Further telegrams from Kungan, which lies opposite to Shashi, indicate that the insurrection in that region is more widespread than was at first supposed. The trouble has its origin in the usual Chinese factor of unrest, namely, starvation; but the anti-dynastic politicians have been very busy sowing revolutionary seed throughout these regions and it is thought that if the present distressed condition continues much longer, serious riots will ensue.

Tuesday, August 2.

As might have been anticipated, Pratas Island has proved a white elephant to the Chinese. It is highly improbable that had the island really offered any opportunities for material development, these would have been neglected through so many centuries. In the hands of Mr. Nishizawa no very signal results were obtained, and we are not surprised to read that the Viceroy of Canton has grown a little weary of the appanage. It is now stated that his Excellency has engaged a Japanese expert, Mr. Kakiuchi, to plan and superintend work on the island, and that this gentleman left Hongkong on the 1st inst. attended by 70 Chinese labourers. Mr. Kakiuchi served for a long time on the island, managing its affairs in the interests of Mr. Nishizawa, and he doubtless possesses an intimate knowledge of the resources that invite exploitation.

England's procedure with regard to Tibet appears to have awakened some apprehensions on China's side. The Peking Government attached a sinister meaning to the mobilization of British troops on the Tibetan frontier, and inferred the existence of some ambitious designs an England's part. But Sir Edward Grey has emphatically disclaimed any aggressive intentions. He declares that so long as British life and property are not endangered, no recourse will be had to military aid. Evidently the entry of Chinese soldiers into Tibet is highly calculated to exasperate the inhabitants and to precipitate collisions. It is in view of such contingencies that Great Britain has made preparations.

On the 30th ult. Mr. Wang Ta-hsieh left Taku for his new post in Tokyo. His suite consisted of 17 persons, among whom are two sons of the late Viceroy Chang. Mr. Wang has had much to do with foreign affairs and especially with England during his official career. In 1903, he was appointed Secretary of the Waiwupu, and two years later he represented his country at the court of St. James. After one year's service in that capacity, he became Vice-President of the Waiwupu, and a year later—namely in 1907—he was appointed Special Commissioner to study the constitution of England, whither he proceeded for that purpose in the spring of 1908.

Wednesday, August 3.

It is curious to observe that the intrusion of religion into secular life is disturbing simultaneously two districts so remote as Tibet and Spain. It would seem that the Chinese Government's attitude towards the Dalai Lama resembles more or less the attitude of the Spanish Liberal Ministry towards the Pope. Both Governments desire to exclude religion altogether from the region of civil law. The people of Tibet, on the other hand, are showing strong sympathy with the Dalai Lama, just as the people of Spain are with the Vatican.

England is placed in a somewhat difficult position with regard to Tibet. If she uses her influence in a sense hostile to the Dalai Lama, she alienates the sympathy of the Tibetans, and may find the lives and properties of her subjects menaced; but if she supports the Buddhist Pontiff, she will antagonize the Chinese Government. The best exit from the dilemma would seem to be the appointment of a new Dalai Lama. There is talk of something of the kind, and rumour adds that if a suitable person were chosen, England would be willing to send a force of troops for the purpose of guarding him safely on his way to Lhasa.

We stated, in a recent issue, that the amount of the indemnity to be levied in consequence of the Changsha riots was fixed altogether at 800,000 taels approximately, out of which total about 700,000 represented foreign property destroyed by the insurgents. Further intelligence explains that the Japanese portion of the indemnity amounts to about one-third of the whole, and is claimed mainly on account of the destruction of the Mitsui store and of the buildings belonging to the Nisshin S.S. Company. This is somewhat perplexing, for it was distinctly stated, as our readers doubtless remember, that no injury has been sustained by the Nisshin Company's buildings, and the fact that they had been unmolested attracted considerable attention at the time.

It is stated that the Chinese Government has decided to raise its postal rates throughout the Empire. At present, the minimum charge is two sen for a letter not exceeding 15 grammes, but in future the former figure will be changed to 3 sen and the latter to 20 grammes. It is expected that this change will bring a considerable increase to the revenue of the posts. During last year the stamps sold aggregated 1 million yen, and the calculation is that this amount will become 1½ millions when the new rate is imposed.

Everything goes to show that the movements of Prince Tsai-Tao, after reaching Chinese territory, were largely influenced by apprehensions of violence. The original programme was that His Highness should reach Tientsin on the 4th inst., but this arrangement was hastened by three days, so that the Prince reached Tientsin at 4 a.m. on the 1st inst., and went straight on to Peking without alighting from the train. This change of programme is said to have been directly caused by a report from the local officials of Hunan, that a party of ten insurgents had set out for Peking by the Lu-Han railway, and by reports from Shanhaikwan, as well as from Changchun, to the effect that symptoms of unrest were visible at both places. Naturally, as so much secrecy was observed, the number of dignitaries who assembled at the station in Peking to welcome the Prince was not large, and the Japanese Representative is said to have been the only member of the Corps Diplomatique present on the occasion.

All recent events go to show that the spirit of unrest prevails widely in China. Ever since the demise of the Empress Dowager, things seem to have passed more or less beyond the control of the Authorities, and the impression produced upon outsiders is that China stands in urgent need of a firm hand at the helm of State.

Thursday, August 4.

The idea that the disturbance in Shantung had been completely quelled seems to have been premature. The latest telegram says that, on the contrary, the numbers of the insurgents have increased largely, and, on a date which is not given, they assumed the offensive and commenced an attack on their own side in the Lanjang district. It appears to have been a very sharp combat while it lasted, for nine of the Imperial troops, including a Colonel, were among the dead, and the rioters are said to have had no less than 230 killed. The local officials telegraphed to Peking in a somewhat alarmist strain and spoke of the insurrection as having extended to Taiyang and Haiyang. The losses on the side of the rioters constitute a terrible record, for if 230 were killed, at least twice as many must have been wounded. When we consider that these unfortunate people are driven to violence by what they believe to be oppression resulting in starvation, it is impossible not to sympathise with them, to some extent at all events. China may be said to be the only country in the world which presents such a spectacle to the observation of the nations.

Rumours have recently been in circulation to the effect that the Chinese Government had placed orders for warships with an American and a German firm, but a message now received by the Mainichi Dempo speaks of the so-called American firm as the "Cunard," which ascription of nationality is perplexing. The name of the German firm which has secured the contract is so mutilated in transliteration that the only word we can decipher with certainty is und. At all events the firm has its headquarters at Hamburg.

It is announced by telegraph from Changchun that on the 3rd inst. the Russian and the Japanese Consuls were to commence, at that place, a series of conferences for the purpose of settling the various questions in connection with private ownership of fixed property in Manchuria by Russian subjects. A good deal has been heard about this matter from time to time, especially about property at Dairen and Port Arthur. Full five years having elapsed since the war, it might not unreasonably be supposed that all such problems would have been settled long ago. But five years are often a very paltry period in international doings, and with all the desire in the world to arrive at a settlement, satisfactory to both sides, the Japanese and Russians seem to be only now approaching the threshold of a final understanding.

USU-DAKE,

Friday, July 29.

Usu-dake is not yet quiescent. Another new crater 300 yards long and 60 yards wide was blown out in the Sobetsu direction at 2 p.m. on the 27th inst.

The people of Abuta and Tokotan seem to have suffered the most. Many of them are described as being without homes or means of sustenance. Of course, the fall of ashes has wholly destroyed the crops in the vicinity.

Saturday, July 30.

Up to the present, six new craters altogether have been opened in the Usu-dake volcano, but, on the whole, things are quieter. Communication between the villages of Sobetsu and Abuta is interrupted, but the inhabitants are returning to Date mura.

Prof. Omori is quoted as saying that the worst is probably over. He thinks that, judging from the conditions in Volcano Bay, a tidal wave would not be likely to work much damage, and he further thinks that the opening of so many craters will constitute safety-valves. It should be noted that this opinion was expressed before the professor's departure for the scene, which took place on the 28th ult.

Monday, August 1.

On the 31st ult. at 9 a.m. there was another violent seismic disturbance in the district surrounding Usudake, and the ashes were blown by a strong north wind over an area of some 10 miles' radius. Prof. Omori and his fellow scientists set up their instruments at Mombetsu and ascended the mountain at 7 a.m. on the 31st ult.—that is to say, just two hours before the renewed activity of the volcano. A party under the guidance of Prof. Sato had commenced the ascent somewhat earlier, and considerable anxiety is said to be entertained as to their fate.

Tuesday, August 2.

It is pleasant to learn that the apprehensions entertained for the safety of Prof. Sato and his associates have been dispelled. In answer to telegrams sent from Tokyo, an intimation has been received that all the scientists who visited the volcano are safe, and that none of them were in any way inconvenienced by the eruption on the 31st ultimo.

Prof. Omori, who ascended the mountain two hours before its last eruption, does not anticipate that there will be any repetition of the phenomenon on any destructive scale. He is quoted as saying that the centre of disturbance is above the sea-level, and that the eruption is not likely to continue active for any great length of time.

VISCOUNT SONE, the ex-Resident-General, has been decorated by the Korean Emperor with the Grand Order of Merit.

THE SUNGALI QUESTION.

The 31st ult. was the last of the 30 days of grace asked for by China for the purpose of discussing the Sungali-River problem. It was understood that unless a settlement satisfactory to Russia was arrived at within that time, St. Petersburg would declare the River open everywhere to Russian vessels. A telegram, to the Asahi Shimbun from Peking says, however, that a solution satisfactory to both sides has practically been found, and that although a few days may be needed to obtain St. Petersburg's signature, there can be no doubt that a convention will be signed about the 2nd or the 3rd instant.

In our last issue we published a statement that a happy result has attended the conferences held during the month of July between Russian and Chinese officials with regard to the question of the Sungali navigation. The Kokumin Shimbun is quite emphatic on the subject. It says that the 30 days' grace asked for by China has resulted in complete agreement between the two Powers, China fully recognizing the navigation rights claimed by Russia under the Aigun Treaty. The High Contracting Parties are to be congratulated on this result. It seemed at one time that the dispute might develop an acute phase; for the difference between the Governments hinged on a question of geography which looked very difficult to solve, and Russia had announced her intention of taking the law into her own hands unless her claim was admitted. Thus the settlement now reached clears the atmosphere appreciably, and we may fairly assume that although China is represented as having recognized Russia's claims in their entirety, the St. Petersburg Government has made concessions calculated to smooth a way for China.

There has been talk for some days past of a settlement of the Sungali problem having been reached by the Russian and Japanese commissioners, and now, the Asahi Shimbun's Peking correspondent wires the main features of the alleged agreement. The first provision is that the whole of the river within the limits of the Three Eastern Provinces shall be opened to navigation by ships of all countries. In the next place, import duties shall be remitted in the case of all goods used within a region of 100 Chinese li from each bank of the river. Thirdly, shipping dues shall be levied, not according to the size of the vessels concerned, but according to the quantity of goods carried by them. The fourth provision is that import duty on cereals shall be reduced by one-third of the amount hitherto paid.

It must be confessed, however, that there is some uncertainty about these conditions. Thus, another account states that the free-trade zone is to be 50 versts, and further, that this privilege is to be extended to goods carried in Russian and Chinese ships only. We find the latter discrimination incredible, in the face of the most favoured nation clause.

There is said to be also a provision in the sense that transit duties shall be imposed instead of tonnage dues; a change which will bring to the Chinese revenue an increase of 25 per-cent. Finally, it is agreed that the service of the tug-boats shall be in Chinese hands. It will probably be found, when the text of the convention is published, that the above statements require modification, but there appears to be no reason to doubt the main fact, that this troublesome question has been settled in a manner satisfactory to both sides.

China's attitude towards the Sungali question seems to have been much appreciated in Russia. Peking not only accepted the Russian proposals, but is also understood to have explicitly based its complaisance upon a desire to promote neighbourly friendship. A telegram from Vladivostok interprets public opinion in that city as being persuaded that the Chinese action in this matter is a direct outcome of the new Russo-Japanese Convention. Underlying that theory there is an evident hypothesis that the Chinese Government is alarmed and has made up its mind to avoid furnishing any pretext whatever for joint action in defence of the status quo by the signatories of the Convention. China's mood, on any special occasion, invariably furnishes food for conjecture to many publicists, but in this case it is very easy to believe that some connection does actually exist between the Sungali question and the new Convention. Peking's wisest course is obviously to throw open the Three Eastern Provinces without loss of time, and, thus to constitute an object of material interest to as wide a circle of Powers as possible. The opening of the Sungali River to the flags of the world belongs to that category of diplomatic acts.

THE MACAO AFFAIR.

Friday, July 29.

The Portuguese troops continued their attack upon the cave on Heng-chin island on the 27th inst. They burned sulphur at the mouth of the cave, and this led to a sortie of the inmates who are said to have used dynamite against their assailants. Volleys were also fired from the interior of the cave. The Portuguese, nevertheless, succeeded in arresting 15 men and 14 women, and also in recovering 3 children who were found to be kidnapped on a previous occasion. There were several casualties among the assaulting troops, and fighting was still in progress at the date of the latest advices. It is stated that the cave is of very large dimensions and has been used for many years by the pirates as a place of refuge.

Sunday, July 31.

The latest from Hengchin Island is that the pirates have surrendered completely, and that the Portuguese forces have been withdrawn. Nothing more is related about the cave which formed the last stronghold of the pirates, through the public are much interested in learning how an entry was effected. It appears that the pirates who have been taken prisoners are very anxious not to be handed over to Chinese jurisdiction. This anxiety is easily understood, for, capital punishment being no longer inflicted under Portuguese law, the pirates, if tried by the Portuguese judiciary, would escape with a term of imprisonment, whereas, were they handed over to the Chinese, decapitation would be certain.

As to the international phase of this affair, an interesting document is reported to have been addressed by the Viceroy of the Two Kuang to the Viceroy in Chungkin, though, whom the latter epithet is intended to designate we do not know. The document says that pirates having kidnapped a number of Chinese children and carried them to an island in Kolowan Bay, the boundaries of which place are in dispute, the Chinese Authorities of Canton proposed to the Portuguese Authorities at Macao a joint expedition to exterminate the pirates and recover the abducted children. But the Portuguese took action on their own account, independently of the Chinese, so that the latter had no recourse except to maintain an observant attitude. The despatch adds that the matter is now under consideration.

This document, if one may accept it as authentic, clears up many doubtful points in the reports hitherto received from Macao. We now understand the neutral action of the Chinese Authorities, and the rumours that they had protested against Portuguese procedure. Doubtless, one result of the incident will be a final settlement of the boundary question. It must be confessed that, whether they were in the right or in the wrong, the Portuguese showed great resolution and commendable activity in this affair. The objects to be attained were the extirpation of a band of truculent ruffians and the recovery of 13 or 14 children who had been abducted. Not an hour could be lost in accomplishing these objects, and instead of waiting to talk, the Portuguese acted. We are much mistaken if the world does not applaud the course taken by them on this occasion. The Chinese, on their side, seem to have behaved with much circumspection. Had they attempted to enforce their claim—which of course seems perfectly valid in their eyes—a serious complication must have arisen.

CHINESE IMMIGRANTS TO MANCHURIA.

The project formed by the Chinese Government for strengthening its hold upon Manchuria by means of colonists does not appear to have met with much success up to the present. The immigrants are nearly all from the provinces of Hupoh and Hunan. They are people already reduced to the verge of starvation, and ready to seize any opportunity, lawful or unlawful, of earning a livelihood. Tens of thousands of these people—we quote the vague Chinese statement literally—have already been transported to the Amur region, where they find themselves confronted by difficulties, very common in such cases, namely, the absence of any sufficient provision for their reception. Land is easy enough to obtain, but instruments to till it, seeds to sow, houses to live in and money to buy food until the harvest is gathered, are not forthcoming. The consequence is serious and growing discontent, and it would seem that the Chinese are creating for themselves a new and very troublesome problem in this region. Rumour has it indeed that the immediate outcome of the situation is likely to be a large reenforcement of the bandits' ranks. In these circumstances, the Viceroy talks of establishing the immigrants in a separate colony, where facilities for supervision will be more easily provided, and His Excellency is also credited with a project for borrowing a large sum from the Bank of China to promote this colonizing enterprise. To outsiders, the idea will present itself that Manchurian finance is already sufficiently burdened without imposing on it this new weight. A telegram received by the Asahi Shimbun from Mukden says that the site of the new settlement is likely to be at Moho, a name rendered familiar to the public by mining questions in former years between China and Russia.

THE NEW CONVENTION.

The world has heard almost as much as it cares to hear about the new Russo-Japanese Convention. Nevertheless, a communication from the Hochi Shimbun's well known Peking correspondent, Mr. Ishikawa Hanzan, is worth quoting. He sums up the situation by saying that France and England strongly favour the Convention; that America and Germany strongly oppose it, and that China regards it with much apprehension. This analysis, it should be observed, applies to the diplomatic world of Peking alone. Mr. Ishikawa then goes on to particularize. He quotes a prominent French official as declaring that the Convention means, not an alliance between Japan and Russia alone, but an alliance between Japan, Russia, France and England.

Passing on then to Chinese opinions, Mr. Ishikawa quotes three high officials whose views may be shortened into the following:—On the 22nd of December, 1905, when the Peking Treaty was concluded, a note was attached by which Japan bound herself to take counsel with the Chinese Government if on any future occasion she should find it necessary to negotiate with Russia about the railways in Manchuria. This secret agreement has been wholly ignored by Japan on the present occasion. In the next place, although the new Convention, as published, consists of only three articles, brief and simple-looking, there are really 12 other articles by which it is agreed that in consideration of Russia recognizing Japan's annexation of Korea, Japan will offer no obstacle to Russia's occupation of Mongolia. This is surely a sufficiently serious outlook. The third Chinese official whom Mr. Ishikawa quotes takes a more moderate and less mysterious view. He says that, when the question is fairly considered, what has happened is that Japan and Russia have come to an agreement about the disposal of important property within Chinese territory and have not seen any occasion to consult China on the subject. China may not feel strong enough to protest openly against such a slight. She will ostensibly acquiesce, for the sake of peace, but she will not forget.

A United States citizen is next summoned to the correspondent's stage. This gentleman's opinions are very pronounced. He declares that the step taken by Japan and Russia amounts to flouting Mr. Secretary Knox's neutralization proposals; that it absolutely blocks the American project of a railway from Chinchow to Aigun, and that it closes the doors of Manchuria in the face of the world.

The German's opinion is much more moderate. He admits that his country has no special interest in Manchuria, but he declares that Europe cannot view without misgivings the formation of such a powerful combination of States in the Far East.

Mr. Ishikawa adds, on his own account, a conjecture that the above appreciations fairly represent the views held by the nations whose units he quotes. We do not agree with him.

AN INTERVIEW.

Mr. Seitz, correspondent of the New York World, has had an interview with Marquis Katsura, and the conversation is quoted by the Hochi Shimbun. It appears that the American correspondent plunged boldly in medias res. He declared that causes of international unbrage were believed to exist between Japan and the United States, and that unless some device were contrived for clearing away the clouds, a storm might be expected. What was Marquis Katsura's opinion? The Marquis is said to have replied, with a laugh, that Japan was virtually America's child, inasmuch as the United States had taken her by the hand 50 years ago and educated her until she was now full-grown and capable of exercising discrimination on her own account. What conceivable reason was there that a child should turn upon its parent or the parent get angry with the child, because the latter was no longer a baby? No one having any true acquaintance with the heart of the Japanese could suspect them for a moment of harbouring enmity towards a country which had placed them under such an obligation. Ex-President Roosevelt and President Taft, as well as other distinguished American citizens who had visited these parts, did not labour under any delusion about Japan's true feelings towards the great Republic. Besides, Japan knew well what sacrifices war involves. She had had the inexpressively bitter experience of losing tens of thousands of her people's lives and hundreds of millions of her national treasure. She was the last country that would think of war.

Mr. Seitz asked whether he might telegraph this statement to the American press. Marquis Katsura replied in the affirmative, but said that he, on his side, had one question to ask, namely, what was the original source of the war-talk in America. To this Mr. Seitz answered that it began with labour troubles in California, and when these were disposed of the matter was taken up by great ship-builders, who agitated for a huge navy, with the idea that orders for the construction of the ships would come their way. Some stalking horse had been necessary to give substance to these theories, and to that end the danger of a war with Japan had been trotted out.

The Japanese, if we may judge from the Hochi, are laughing a little in their sleeves. They cannot forget that the New York World, which has now adopted the role of peace-maker, acted a very different part, not long ago. They are quite willing to shake hands, but memory refuses to be altogether stifled.

THE TOKYO RAILWAY.

It is stated that the period originally assigned by charter for the completion of the Tokyo Railway will be extended by 5 years. The date fixed by the present charter is 1910, and the Company proposes to finish the work by 1915 at an outlay of 1½ million yen annually. The Government has been induced to agree to this postponement in consideration of the fact that 1910 was fixed when three tram companies were in existence. The amalgamation of these three into one has shown that several of the lines constructed under the triple arrangement are practically, planne duseless after amalgamation, and actual experience has been needed to determine which of these line should be preserved and which abolished. The length of the roads already built is 123 miles and there remain to be built under the original charters, 114 miles. But if the roads rendered useless after amalgamation be subtracted, the construction of 60 miles more will complete the system, and the arrangement is that the Company should build these 60 miles at the rate of 12 miles annually. It will be observed that this programme contemplates the completion of the system two years before the opening of the great Exhibition.

We confess that we are unable to understand the object which the Asahi Shimbun has in view in its repeated attacks upon the Tokyo Railway Co. These hostile criticisms evidently emanate from one and the same pen, the pen of a writer who is absolutely unable to appreciate any argument advanced in behalf of the Company. His latest point is the Company's failure to complete the system of lines prescribed by the charter. Doubtless, if the strict letter of the law were adhered to, the Company would be in the wrong for not having already built nearly twice as many miles of road as it had actually laid down. But, on the other hand, if the spirit of the law were observed, the Company would not be tied to a fare which everyone admits to be too small. It is here that the curious aspect of the question presents itself. We naturally expect that when a great and an independent journal like the Asahi Shimbun undertakes to discuss such a problem, it will not shrink from adverting to the main issue, namely, the rate of fare. But our contemporary carefully avoids touching that topic, or at any rate, puts it aside as unworthy of discussion. The whole story of the Tokyo Railway, as it appears in the metropolitan press, presents a dream-like aspect which one is not accustomed to associate with business enterprise.

A RUMOUR.

Among the suite of Prince Tsai-Tao, on the occasion of the latter's visit to Europe, was Mr. Yin Chang, President of the Board of War. It appears that this official, although, in the ordinary course of procedure, he ought to have accompanied the Prince home, has remained in Berlin. The simple explanation of this event is that General Yin is awaiting the return of the Kaiser, who is absent from the German capital on a summer tour. But simple explanations do not satisfy the inquisitive section of the public when the movements of high personages are concerned. Accordingly, we are not surprised to find that Mr. Yin's protracted sojourn in the German capital is said to be part of the scheme for sounding Germany's ideas about the new Russo-Japanese Convention, a task for which General Yin is especially fitted, inasmuch as he presided at one time over the Chinese Legation in Berlin. Of course, it is not possible to speak with absolute assurance on such a topic, but we feel tolerably confident that Germany will not assume an attitude in any sense unfriendly to the Russo-Japanese Convention. Undoubtedly, there are in Europe and America, as well as in Asia, a considerable number of persons who would be pleased to see Germany, the United States and China join hands to crush Japan. We may add that even among Russians, Englishmen and Frenchmen, there certainly are advocates of that outcome. But the nations themselves and their leaders are free from any taint of such a desire.

BANQUET IN TOKYO.

A dinner was given by the International Press Association of Japan at 7 p.m. on Friday, July 29th, at the Imperial Hotel, in honour of Mr. D. D. Braham, Assistant Foreign Editor of the London Times, Mr. Don C. Seitz, Business Manager of the New York World, and Mr. M. Zumoto, Chief of the Oriental Information Agency in New York. The Hon. K. Minoura was in the chair. About thirty covers were laid, but Mr. Braham was prevented by illness from attending.

The Hon. K. Minoura said in his speech:

Gentlemen,—I take great pleasure in presiding at our dinner this evening, especially as our guests, Mr. Don C. Seitz, special correspondent of the New York World, and Mr. M. Zumoto, who is about to return to New York, have, in spite of the heat, given us the honour of their kind acceptance. Mr. Seitz seems to be a born journalist. The New York World, one of the greatest papers in America, has of late years strenuously refuted the wilful rumours that have tried ineffectually to disturb the relations between America and Japan, and has advocated closer friendship between the two nations. I am confident that his visit to Japan, and what he has seen here, will strengthen the campaign undertaken by the New York World in favour of upholding the traditional relationship between America and Japan for the sake of the world's peace. I see no necessity to emphasize the significance of the Oriental Information Agency, which Mr. Zumoto has established. His past career and his ability as a journalist eloquently speak for themselves. With all our brother members, I wish his enterprise every success. I regret that Mr. Braham cannot attend the dinner this evening owing to indisposition, and that we have thus lost an opportunity of personally welcoming him to our country and the fraternity of our Press.

Gentlemen, please fill your glasses and join with me in drinking the health and prosperity of the guests of the Association.

Mr. Seitz said in reply:

The Chairman does me too much honour in calling me the "correspondent of The World." I do not enjoy that exalted rank. I am instead the business manager, who must see that the weekly pay-roll is met and all our large affairs properly administered. But it seemed well to Mr. Joseph Pulitzer, the wise and far-seeing owner of The World, to send a business man to see Japan and observe its affairs apart from art and romance, and so I am here. It will be difficult for me to keep art and romance out of my thought, because one is always before my eyes and the other always present in your great history.

Mr. Pulitzer, as perhaps you know, is a firm believer in peace and good will among nations who respect their own honour and live up to their obligations to mankind. He feels his newspaper has done something in the past in the interest of international welfare and he intends it shall do more in the future. If truth and common sense can be presented in words to the American people, The World is going to do it.

So much for my errand, of which I think I need say no more to you, but I may say a word about ourselves—about the newspapers we all try to represent. There ought to be, and I think there are, three truly unselfish professions in the world, the teacher, the doctor, and the newspaper worker. The printer was the true advance agent for modern civilization. Before Columbus found the new Continent, Gutenberg and Faust brought ink, type and paper together and awakened the minds of men. The bibles of the reformation came hot from the press and the newspaper in proper time opened its pages to the public view, with results that do not here need re-telling. The editor and reporter make the newspaper. Without good editors all schemes and subsidies fail. Even a business manager cannot make it succeed. Put your money into your brains, let the brains show in your sheets and success will follow. There is no other formula. Remember a newspaper is the our thing that shows its strength and weakness in every issue. It can hide nothing. It works in the open. Its sins and virtues are not cloaked. The newspaper man must lead a life apart. He cannot have friends or any other interest than that of his paper, if he and it are to succeed.

Gentlemen, I thank you for the great courtesies I have received at your hands. I wish that prosperity may attend you, and follow for a thousand years the noble nation of Japan.

Mr. M. Zumoto also replied.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

The returns for the last 11 days of July were:—

	Yen.
Exports	12,236,000
Imports	12,457,000
Excess of Imports.....	221,000

The figures for the period January 1st to July 31st are:—

	Yen.	Compared with last year.
Exports	246,825,000	+29,748,000
Imports	275,237,000	+28,066,000
Excess of Imports...	28,412,000

The Department of Agriculture and Commerce has issued an analysis of the country's foreign trade during the first 6 months of the current year. The following figures are given:—

		Compared with 1909.	Per-centages.
Exports.....	211,201,360	+24,201,065	+13
Imports.....	239,944,793	+25,426,818	+11.8
Totals	451,146,153	+29,627,883	+12.3
Excess of Imports	28,743,433	+1,225,753	+4.4

Taking the figures month by month, and lumping together exports and imports, we have the following results:—

Months.	Yen.	Yen.
1	71,508,886	+16,004,919
2	70,233,946	+2,705,063
3	73,979,823	+4,031,193
4	76,366,567	+10,954,842
5	85,558,766	+7,370,477
6	73,442,955	+6,508,125
Total	451,146,153	+49,627,883

The report goes on to say that the above very satisfactory figures do not result from fitful increases in a few limited directions. They are spread over nearly every item of the trade, and they may be thus taken as indicating a steady movement towards the restoration of prosperity. Thus, in exports we find, increases of cotton yarns, straw braid, cotton fabrics, rice, sugar, timber, copper, habutae, silk handkerchiefs, ceramic work, lacquer and so forth; while on the side of imports, there are increases in raw cotton, ginned cotton, wheat, kerosene, cloth, serge, iron, calico, cotton fabrics, paper and so forth. In fact, this Departmental analysis is highly satisfactory.

THE BANK OF JAPAN.

There is considerable discussion about the advisability of the Bank of Japan lowering its rate of interest, as such an act would be for the 3rd time during a few months. The Government has paid out for the redemption of National debt in the past year a sum of 160 to 170 million yen, and it will supplement this by a further payment of 35 millions in October. Meanwhile there are 53 millions lying in the Bank of Japan where they carry no interest, and the market rate of interest varies from 3.65 per-cent. to 4.75. The time seems to have come, therefore, when the Bank of Japan may fairly announce a further reduction. On the other hand, it is not thought likely that this measure will materially increase the demand for money. As a matter of fact, few enterprises offer any inducement to capitalists now-a-days. The principal are, Hydro-Electric Power, Electric Trams, Electric Lighting and Gas, all of which, combined, do not call for a capital materially exceeding 200 million yen. It is evident that until the field becomes enlarged, the spirit of enterprise will not be effective. If, as now seems probable, the rice harvest turns out abundant, and the country's foreign trade is prosperous during the remainder of the year, a business revival may reasonably be expected. But there is nothing to warrant the Bank of Japan in maintaining its present rate of discount.

PORT ARTHUR.

On the 29th ultimo, a British squadron of 8 ships, headed by the Minotaur and under the command of Admiral Winslow entered Port Arthur. It is expected that the ships will remain there seven days, and the Japanese Port Admiral, as well the inhabitants, are making every endeavour to give a hearty welcome to the visitors. The telegraph speaks of wrestling matches, dances, fireworks and other sources of entertainment. It is stated that the Port has not been so animated since the days of the war.

The interchange of civilities between the British squadron and the Japanese local authorities at Port Arthur included an incident which is spoken of by Japanese newspapers with much gratification. On the evening of the 30th ult. the British Admiral gave a banquet on his flagship to the Governor-General, the Port Admiral and other leading officials. When the health of the Emperor of Japan was drunk, a salute of 21 guns was fired by the Minotaur. This is said to have been the first instance of such a ceremonial at a banquet after sunset.

MR. R. KONDO.

At the recent meeting held by six chambers of commerce to welcome the businessmen on their return from touring in China, Mr. Kondo Rempei, leader of the tourists, expressed on behalf of himself and his colleagues profound satisfaction that their visit to China had resulted in establishing such good relations between the two nations. As a matter of fact, Europe had been nearer to Japan than China, though geographically the distance between the two Far Eastern Empires was insignificant. But this state of separation had now been brought to an end, and it might fairly be hoped that the two peoples would grow steadily in mutual knowledge and friendship. Great opportunities lay before China. It was practically certain that in a few years' time she would be one of the greatest manufacturing countries of the world, and in achieving that important result she was entitled to her neighbour's full co-operation. Commercial friendship between China and Japan meant peace in the Far East, and peace in the Far East, meant peace in the world. He sincerely hoped, therefore, that the good beginning now made would be carried to a successful issue.

DEATH OF VISCOUNT INOUE.

We greatly regret to learn that Viscount Inoue Masaru is lying dangerously ill in London. He has suffered for a considerable time from kidney and bladder trouble, and his friends doubted the wisdom of his visit to London in connection with the Exhibition. He is not a man, however, who takes much account of his own physical condition. The telegraph says that he has been obliged to undergo an operation, and that it has not been successful.

In our last issue we stated that Viscount Inoue Masaru was lying in London at the point of death, and we have now the sorrow of recording that death took place on the 2nd inst., in the sequel of an unsuccessful surgical operation. Viscount Inoue was in his 67th year. He has always been regarded as the father of the railways in Japan, and old residents remember how frequently he was seen in Yokohama between 1868 and 1871, when the Tokyo-Yokohama line was in course of construction under the management of Mr. Morrell. Subsequently, he became Director-General of Government Railways, which post he held until 1887, when he retired permanently from official life. He spoke English fluently and had a high esteem for Englishmen and English things. It was under his auspices, nevertheless, that Japanese railways ultimately became independent of all foreign aid, in the matter alike of construction and of operation. It appears that when he agreed to visit Europe in May last, as Adviser to the Railway Board, he was well aware that the state of his health rendered long travel exceedingly perilous. But he did not allow himself to be deterred by this consideration, and thus he may veritably be said to have died at his post, which is precisely the end he would himself have chosen.

Viscount Inoue's first visit to England was made in company with Prince Ito and Marquis Inoue in 1862, and so earnest was he to learn engineering that he worked as a common miner during a part of his stay in England. He did not return to Japan with his two comrades, but remained abroad studying his profession until 1868, when he was recalled to take a leading part in the construction of the Tokyo Yokohama road. When the news of his mortal illness reached Japan he was raised to the Senior Rank of the Second Grade.

THE SEISAN CHOSA-KAI.

It would seem that at last some modifications are to be effected in the Commercial Company Laws with the object of exercising stricter control over the acts of company directors and auditors. Precisely what provisions will be introduced or what amendments effected, there is no indication yet; but the Seisan Chosa-kai (Association for Investigating Products) which was recently established at the instance of the Prime Minister, is said to be busying itself very actively in this matter. Further, a scheme is in course of preparation for giving effect to the idea of establishing more convenient communication between sea and shore in Japanese ports.

Another subject to which this Association's attention is directed is the freight on merchandise. The Government has been asked to furnish complete figures such as shall constitute a basis for examination.

LIGHT RAILWAYS.

In the Official Gazette of the 2nd inst., there was published a body of laws, enacted by the last Diet at the instance of the Government, for the purpose of granting facilities to construct light railways, which shall connect the minor centres of trade and production with the existing lines of railway. It is plain enough that the nationalization of railways had the effect of checking private enterprise in that direction. In fact, it may be said that no charter for a private railway has been granted since nationalization. Meanwhile, the profits earned by the State lines do not suffice for purposes of development, and thus the system may be said to be at a standstill. Of course, there are the tram-lines (kido-sen) which are exploited wholly by private enterprise. But these are limited to cities and their suburbs. They do not meet the need which obviously presses; namely, the connexion of provincial districts with the system of State Railways. The Government's plan is to allow the people to construct these connexions with private capital in the cheapest manner consistent with the requirements of safe travel. The law, with its accompanying body of regulations, sanctioning such constructions, has now been promulgated, and it is expected that a portion of the surplus capital lying idle will be diverted to this field.

THE INDUSTRIAL BANK OF JAPAN.

The 17th general meeting of the shareholders of the above Bank was held on the 3rd inst. when a dividend of 8 per cent. was declared, reserves to the extent of 180,000 yen were set aside, and 66,680 was carried forward to the next account.

The Governor, Mr. Sayeda, stated in his speech that since the commencement of the year there have been signs of recovery in the realm of business, and there has been also a gradual and healthy increase in the demand for money to be employed in business undertakings. He admitted, however, that the existence of a considerable accumulation of idle capital made it difficult for financiers to obtain favourable results. He explained that the Bank had been able to guarantee debentures aggregating 5½ million yen, namely, 1½ millions for the Fuji paper mill, 3 millions for the Fuji Gas and Yarn Company, and 1 million for the Tokyo Artificial Fertilizer Company.

THE ANGLO-JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

Tokyo newspapers publish a statement, said to have been made by an official in the Foreign Office, with reference to the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition. Referring to the complaints that some of the side-shows have not been calculated to enhance Japanese reputation, the official treats such criticisms as unworthy of serious attention. He claims that the Exhibition has been a signal success, so far as its main object is concerned. That object is to bring the people of the two countries into close contact commercially and socially, and the result has been eminently satisfactory. As for the nature of the exhibits, that was quite a secondary consideration, about which, the Foreign Office, at all events, did not give itself much concern.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION.

Public opinion continues to be variously expressed with regard to the economic situation. One high authority is quoted as saying in effect that there is no valid ground for pessimism. The only trouble is that the market price of shares does not respond to the wishes of speculators. But that is in reality a fact to be welcomed. It simply means that investors have learned to exercise discrimination and to repose trust only where trust is merited. Actual statistics show that the spirit of enterprise is sufficiently vigorous and there is no such superfluity of unemployed capital as some people would have us believe.

On the other hand, publicists like the editor of the Nippon Shimbun ruthlessly attack the Government, and maintain that the official method of finance is mere tinkering. There can be no real change for the better until the burdens of the people are reduced to something like the ante-bellum figures. All the Government's manipulation for converting the national debt and redeeming portions of it is practically useless. It need hardly be said that the Hochi Shimbun shares the views of the Nippon, in so far as the condemnation of the Treasury's policy is concerned.

THE CROWN PRINCE OF GERMANY.

It is announced that the Prince Imperial of Germany will visit the Far East, but the date is not fixed, nor is it certain whether he will be accompanied by the Princess Imperial. The German Newspaper of Shanghai, commenting on the event, says that it points clearly to two things; the first, that the rumours recently circulated from England as to the ill-health of the Kaiser are groundless; the other, that peace in the Occident is expected to continue for some years. Our German contemporary adds that this will be the first instance of a German Prince Imperial travelling outside Europe, and that the fact bears eloquent witness to the changed conditions of Germany. A hope is also expressed that His Imperial Highness will be accompanied by the Princess.

The news is confirmed that the Imperial Prince of Germany will pay a visit to the East in the autumn of this year. The main objective of the trip is to be an inspection of Kiaochow, but thereafter His Imperial Highness will visit the Chinese and the Japanese Courts. He intends to come overland from Europe and will spend a short time at the Imperial Palace in Russia en route.

THE FINANCIAL TROUBLE IN SHANGHAI.

The news received from Shanghai a few days ago was that to relieve the financial pressure and avert the closure of three important exchange shops will all the consequent distress, the foreign and Chinese bankers at the port had agreed to furnish accommodation provided that the Viceroy at Nanking guaranteed the transaction. The telegraph now alleges that this question having been submitted to the consideration of the Prince Regent, obtained his approval, and 3½ million taels will accordingly be lent by the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank, by Messrs Jardine Matheson & Co., and by other capitalists. The Viceroy at Nanking guarantees the loan.

THE WEATHER.

A centre of depression declared itself on the 28th ult. near the Ryukyu Islands and travelled thence in a north westerly direction at the slow rate of 12 or 13 miles an hour. It was expected to reach the south coast of Korea on the 29th ult., and to pass thence into the Sea of Japan. Doubtless it was owing to this atmospheric disturbance that a comparatively cool wave visited Tokyo and Yokohama on the 28th and 29th.

The two centres of disturbance which menaced Japan have travelled elsewhere, and normal climatic conditions have been restored. It is expected that the real heat of summer will now commence.

A centre of depression has violated all precedents by declaring itself on the east of the main island, and travelling north. All the regions on the west are enjoying fair weather, but this disturbance on the east is responsible for the showery and chilly conditions which prevailed in Tokyo and Yokohama on the 2nd and 3rd instant.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Saturday, July 30.

A strong reaction in the upward direction took place on the 30th ult. on the Stock Exchange. There is no palpable reason for this movement.

Monday, August 2.

The market continues brisk. Prices rose in the forenoon yesterday, but profit-taking sales produced some depression in the afternoon.

Tuesday, August 2.

Yesterday, as might have been expected, saw a re-action from the high prices of the previous two days.

Wednesday, August 3.

Prices were tolerably firm in the forenoon, but the state of the weather caused some alarm in the afternoon and the market weakened. We append the quotation for October delivery:—

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

The Official Gazette announces that the second installments of the 1904 War Loan, and a quantity of Tobacco Bonds will be redeemed by the 30th of September next. The former redemption concerns a sum of 28,417,200 yen, and the Tobacco Bonds amount to 6,417,840 yen. It is stated by the Authorities that money for the above redemption is ready, and that although the operation need not be carried out until the end of the present fiscal year, its completion in September is advisable as saving interest. Of course persons desiring to exchange 5-per-cent Bonds for 4-per-cent. will be allowed to do so.

Strong opposition has been developed to the programme of a canal between Tokyo and Yokohama. The opponents of the scheme have drawn up a petition which carries 1,400 signatures. They claim that the canal would destroy the fishing industry at Haneda and Omori, would narrow the dimensions of Rokugo River's embouchure which, on the contrary, it is desirable to enlarge for irrigation purposes, and would interrupt the service of boats already in existence.

Viscount Sone is said to have received some relief by using radium, a small quantity of which was sent to him by Baron Iwasaki. This remarkable substance is said to have alleviated the pain to such an extent that two or three injections of morphine suffice in a day, instead of the five or six hitherto found necessary. There is very little radium to be bought in Japan. It is said that for the small quantity used during the illness of the late Baron Iwasaki, 5,000 yen was spent.

Tokyo newspapers state that at a meeting held on the 30th ult. the Yokohama Municipality unanimously decided on the municipalization of the tram lines. The reason assigned for this step is that if the lines are left in their present hands, the necessary extensions will be indefinitely postponed. The project now on foot is to carry the service not only through the principal streets but also right around the Settlement.

Settling day on the Stock Exchange passed off quietly. The number of shares handled was 97,150, and their total price 7,924,240 yen, being an average of 81,517 yen per share. The number of shares was only 10 more than the figure for last month, but their total price showed an increase of 2,087,760 yen, being an average increase of 21,484 yen per share.

We greatly regret to announce the death of Mr. George Flett, which took place on the 27th ult. in the sequel of a motor accident. The deceased gentleman was chief partner in the great firm of Messrs. Dick Kerr & Co. In 1906, he paid a visit to Japan and made numerous friends in this country. The news of his sudden death has given a great shock to people in Tokyo.

The Kinugawa Hydro-Electric Company has at last obtained a charter for supplying electric power to the Tokyo Railway. The period of the charter is 25 years, and the Company must be actually formed within 6 months from the date of signing the charter. All wires must be carried underground unless special permission be obtained from the Municipality.

It is stated that the Departments of the Navy and Finance have come to an agreement, the gist of which is, that the additional sum included in next year's budget for naval maintenance will be only 15 million yen.

The following summary of the Missionary problem was put out at the final meeting of the recent Conference at Edinburgh in a Message to the Churches:—

"The next ten years will in all probability constitute a turning point in human history, and may be of more critical importance in determining the spiritual evolution of mankind than many centuries of ordinary experience. If those years are wasted havoc may be wrought that centuries are not able to repair. On the other hand, if they are rightly used they may be among the most glorious in Christian history. But it has become increasingly clear to us that we need something far greater than can be reached by any economy or re-organisation of the existing forces. Just as a great national danger demands a new standard of patriotism and service from every citizen, so the present condition of the world and the missionary task demand from every Christian and from every congregation a change in the existing scale of missionary zeal and service and the elevation of our spiritual ideal. There is an imperative spiritual demand that national life and influence as a whole be Christianised, so that the entire impact, commercial and political, now of the west upon the east and now of the stronger races upon the weaker, may confirm and not impair the message of the missionary enterprise."

Mr. Uchida, Chief of the Shipping Bureau in the Department of Communications, states, according to the Mainichi Dempo, that the Toyo S.S. Co. is not severing its connexion with the Pacific Mail S.S. Co., but has merely entered into an agreement with the new Western Pacific Railway. Inasmuch, however, as keen competition is pretty certain to arise sooner or later between the Harriman Railways and the West Pacific, the Toyo S.S. Co. must expect to be drawn into this rivalry. Mr. Uchida speaks as though the system hitherto existing had not been free from abuses, but his remarks upon this point are vague.

The affairs of the Soy Company do not seem likely to be satisfactorily arranged. The directors of the Company insist that the President, Mr. Tajima, should put up 60 millions for the liquidation fund, but Mr. Tajima declines to give more than 45 millions, and there matters rest. Bankruptcy is now considered inevitable.

The Government of the U.S. of America has set an example to all countries by enacting that every ship traversing the high seas, under certain conditions, must be equipped with wireless telegraphic apparatus. Japan is now talking of following this example. The new American law does not go into operation until July next, and there is consequently plenty of time for Japan to legislate in that interval. This is no mere question of caprice. On the presence or absence of wireless telegraphic apparatus may depend at any moment the safety of the steamer and her crew and passengers. From that point of view, it cannot be called arbitrary on the part of the Government to legislate on such a subject, and, considering the immense improvement effected in wireless telegraphy during the past few years, it would be culpable to neglect the utilization of this wonderful agent.

We read, in the Chuo Shimbun, that a certain Mr. Takahashi Kenshin has made a discovery of a revolutionary character. In the course of some experiments with zinc, it happened that a piece of bamboo was subjected to the influence of a certain acid, and that, to the experimenter's surprise, the bamboo was changed into a soft, white mass. Following up the suggestion offered by this incident, Mr. Takahashi extended his investigations, and finally arrived at the result that, by a certain course of treatment, practically all kinds of wood and bark can be converted into cotton of excellent quality. What this means may be gathered from the fact that, whereas one kwan (8½ lbs.) of raw cotton now costs 2 yen 40 sen, the cotton produced by Mr.

Takahashi's process can be sold wholesale for 80 sen and retail for 1 yen. He has applied for patent rights in nine countries. The Chuo Shimbun publishes a photograph of the inventor. It shows a very typical Japanese face of the thoughtful type.

There is some trouble in the ranks of the Keihin Railway Company. Last year, a change of President was necessitated owing to a loan of 200,000 yen made to Mr. Fujimoto, a broker. Mr. Miura was then appointed President, but against him, also, as well as against an auditor, Mr. Ito, and a managing Director, Mr. Moriya, charges are now preferred that they located the stations on the line so as to suit the landed property of themselves or their friends, and that they committed various other selfish acts. It is thought probable that there will be a complete recasting of the Board of Directors.

THE FORMOSAN CAMPAIGN.

SOME POINTS OF RESEMBLANCE TO THE CLOSING STAGES OF THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.

[WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL."]

To one who has seen active service in the field, the position of affairs in Formosa at present, with regard to the military operations there, is very similar, though, of course, on a smaller scale, to that in which the British army found itself in South Africa after the two Capitals had been taken and the war, strategically, was practically over. Those troops who, after the early reverses, had taken part in the battle of Paardeberg, marched gloriously "with the flag to Bloemfontein and Pretoria," relieved Ladysmith or Mafeking, or helped in their defence, like the Japanese troops who served in the Manchurian campaign and fought in the great battles, were accounted veritable heroes, and, no doubt, deserved it. But the hardships which they suffered for a few weeks, compared with those suffered by the troops, especially the mounted infantry, who took part in the subsequent "guerilla warfare," which lasted for a period which ran into years, were a mere bagatelle.

And yet, in the eyes of the man in the street, it was the soldier who had taken part in one of these "epoch-making events" who was belauded, fêted, etc., and the man who had spent many weary months of night-marches on short rations in quest of the wily and evasive Boer was almost ignored. Not that the public is to blame; it is only natural that the glamour, pomp and circumstance supposed to be connected with big battles appeal more strongly to sentiment.

In the English press one used to read accounts, such as one now reads in the Japanese press, of "a night march, 8 killed, 15 wounded," etc., etc. and few realised what a life these mounted infantry had been leading and what a weary repetition this was of what they had been doing for months. Subjoined is a fair example of a week's routine of a column employed in "guerilla warfare."

A WEEK OF GUERRILLA WARFARE.

Sunday, 3 a.m.—Reveille-breakfast, consisting of one army-biscuit and coffee, saddle up, pack up tents, blankets, etc. 4 a.m.—Fall in and march off. March all day under a burning sun, occasional sniping by the enemy, especially at the rear guard. About 4 p.m., halt, unsaddle, pitch tents, which have been following in convoy, pickets posted, etc. 5.30 p.m.—Information having been received that there was commando of Boers in laager about 40 miles away, the order would be given to saddle up. Each man would be served out one day's rations, for himself and horse, and the column would move off, without convoy or heavy artillery, so as to increase its mobility. The night—dark, perhaps rainy, and, if in winter, cold. Walking, trotting, cantering; over kopjes covered with loose stones, through rivers, swollen sometimes, when many a poor fellow has lost his life in crossing, but that 40 miles must be covered before dawn, as silently as possible, and by the least frequented route.

A little before daybreak, a halt of half an hour at what is judged to be a sufficient distance from the enemy's outposts, while, if possible, an encircling movement is noiselessly carried out. At the first streak of dawn, a wild, mad gallop for the Boer laager, which we hope we have surprised, but which, alas, on many occasions has got wind of our movements, and flitted during the night. Then a skirmish and chase after the retreating commando, if any, till about 10 or 11 o'clock, when a halt would be called and coffee made (if such a thing as a stick of dry wood could be found), a biscuit eaten and horses fed. Rest till about 1 o'clock, then commence the weary march back to the convoy, with the prisoners, if any, your horse and yourself done up. 8 p.m.—Camp for the night. Pickets posted, very little left in the way of food for horse or man, nothing but an overcoat for cover. Up at day-break the next morning. Breakfast, if you have saved any. March off about 3.30 a.m., and after many halts, eventually reach the convoy, utterly exhausted, late that night, Tuesday. Wednesday morning at day-break, off again with the convoy. Very likely, another night-march on Wednesday or Thursday which will bring one back to the convoy about Saturday night.

DIFFICULTIES IN FORMOSA.

"Why has not the campaign in Formosa been brought to a successful issue long before this?" one imagines a well-meaning citizen demanding. "The officers who are conducting the campaign appeared to be confident enough at the beginning."

The answer seems quite obvious, to one who has had experience in this kind of warfare.

In the first place, there are no definite strategic positions, towns or capitals to be taken, with the enemy defending them, success in which would bring the war to a definite conclusion. Secondly, the Formosans are fighting in a naturally difficult campaigning country, of which they know every inch, whereas to the Japanese it is practically unknown.

In the guerilla warfare part of the South African War, although the British forces outnumbered the enemy to an enormous degree—something like 200,000 to 60,000—it was found impossible, when employing the ordinary tactics of warfare, to make much headway against such an enemy. A commando of Boers, if menaced by a column of our troops, would evade us by simply disbanding, pro tem., after arranging a place of rendez-vous in, perhaps, some district remote from that in which our columns were operating. Realizing the futility of continuing the almost fruitless tactics that had hitherto been pursued, the blockhouse system was adopted, and it was owing to the efficacy of this way of dealing with an enemy spread over a very large area, that the war was brought to a successful issue, the enemy recognising that, within a short time, capture or death for one and all was inevitable.

Whether the blockhouse system would be equally efficacious in subduing the Formosans, I am not in a position to say, but it seems to me that it would be much better to do something on a larger scale now, than to allow the campaign to drag on for an indefinite period with its consequent detrimental effect on the moral of the troops and the popularity of the 'war' with the public.

However, this is a digression. The writer's object in preparing this article is, as one who had had personal experience in guerilla warfare, to remind those who joined in the popular enthusiasm and admiration for the soldiers who gloriously laid down their lives for their country during the Manchurian campaign, that equally brave men are now suffering hardships and laying down their lives, but in a very quiet sort of way, for their country, in Formosa.

His Majesty the Emperor, by the interest he is displaying in the troops, is setting an example worthy of emulation by his subjects.

THE COUNTER-BLAST AT BERLIN.

(COMMUNICATED.)

Full reports of the great Missionary Conference at Edinburgh have already appeared in these columns. In due time, no doubt, equally full reports of the Fifth International Congress of Free Christianity and Religious Progress to be held at Berlin Aug. 5—10 will find their way to Yokohama. When the full text of the addresses delivered at the two Conferences reaches this far-off country, open-minded readers will be in a position to judge whether in this 20th century among enlightened people in the Far East Christian ethics founded on supernaturalism have the shadow of a chance of success or not. Propagandists may be very earnest and very sincere, but if the doctrines they preach are quite out of keeping with modern thought, they can only be disseminated successfully among ignorant people. At the Edinburgh Conference Orthodoxy was in the ascendant. At the Berlin Congress dogmatic Christianity will be at a discount. Advanced thinkers in this part of the world may wish to hear something. Here is a statement of the objects of the Congress. "The International Council was organized at Boston, U.S.A. on May 25th, 1900. It seeks to bring into closer union, for exchange of ideas, mutual service, and the promotion of their common aims, the historic liberal churches, the liberal elements in all churches, the scattered liberal congregations and isolated workers for religious freedom and progress in many lands. It aims to be a source of encouragement and strength to them in their struggles against dogmatic intolerance and ecclesiastical tyranny. It cultivates large and fraternal relations with the great liberal movements in religion now going on under various names and auspices throughout the world. To promote these ends, it holds a triennial Congress in some acknowledged seat of religious enlightenment and freedom, the general arrangements for which are intrusted to the liberal bodies and communities which have extended the invitation. Such Congresses have been held in London, Amsterdam, Geneva, and Boston, attended by from 500 to 2,400 members, representing 16 nationalities and 30 religious followships. No assent to any formal dogma or adhesion to any particular church is required for membership. All who desire to increase religious enlightenment, freedom, and tolerance and to make the world better, are cordially invited to participate in it.

The Congress will be attended by the leaders of liberal Christian thought in Europe and America. Dr. S. A. Eliot, of Boston, is the Chairman of the Executive Committee and Dr. C. W. Wendte, also of Boston, the General Secretary. What liberal thought has done for Christianity and the world in the past and what it is likely to accomplish in the near future will be demonstrated in a clear and scholarly manner by many of the most eminent theologians of Europe and America. What is known as the New Theology will be expounded by those who have taken a leading part in its development. To German Theology and German Church Life it is proposed to devote several sessions of the Congress. The Rev. R. Minami is to represent Japan and he will give an account of the anti-supernatural Christian movement here, of which little notice was taken at the Edinburgh Conference apparently, unless the Japan Mail correspondent was absent from the Conference when this subject was discussed.

W.D.

THE unarmoured cruiser Newcastle has completed her steam, gunnery and manoeuvring trials, with results which equal, and in some respects are superior to, those of the vessels of the type already tried. On her full power trial the speed averaged was just over 26¼ knots. The coal consumption trials were equally favourable. The Newcastle proved an easily manoeuvred ship, and the trials of the two 6 in. and ten 4 in. q.f. and five smaller guns gave satisfactory results.

THE CHINCHOW-AIGUN RAILWAY.

(The Japan Daily Mail, July 30.)

THIS problem is not yet buried. We learn, from Shanghai telegrams to the Mainichi Dempo and the Asahi Shimbun, that according to intelligence furnished by Reuter to the North-China Daily News, the China Association has taken up the question and is seeking to make it a crucial test of the Open Door in Manchuria. The Association argues that if Russia and Japan succeed in vetoing the construction of this line, the inevitable issue will be exclusion of English capital from the Three Eastern Provinces. Therefore, the idea is to make this a test case and to enlist all possible aid in bringing pressure on the British Government. Circulars have accordingly been addressed to the various chambers of commerce throughout the United Kingdom, setting forth the arguments which appeal most forcibly to the Association and seeking the coöperation of the chambers. Many of the latter are said to have already signified their approval, but the attitude of the British Government is reported to be unsatisfactory from the point of view of the agitators. Downing Street appears to insist that any pressure brought to bear upon Russia in this matter would be contrary to the provisions of the treaty concluded between Russia and Great Britain in 1899, according to which treaty the regions north of the great wall were to be regarded as Russia's sphere of railway influence, in consideration of the Yangtsz Valley being similarly reserved for Great Britain. This difficulty, however, would not be operative against a railway from Chinchow to Yaoyan, and the Association is credited with the programme of limiting itself for the present to the construction of that line, conditionally on the Chinese Emperor promising to sanction its extension at a later date.

We give these facts in deference to their alleged source, but we are bound to say that we do not attach full credence to the story. There is one obvious discrepancy between the facts and their statement. The China Association is represented as considering this railway question a conclusive test of the accessibility of Manchuria to British capital in the face of Russian and Japanese opposition. But the truth is, as it seems to us, that the exclusiveness is mainly on the side of the Association so far as Japan is concerned. It is an old experience that error dies hard, and we do not at present recall any incident which illustrates the aphorism more vividly than does this Aigun-Chinchow Railway. For, the China Association non obstante, the country against which a policy of exclusion would appear to be followed is Japan. The Japanese Government has never objected to the building of a railway between Chinchow and Aigun, or to the investment of British capital in such an enterprise. On the contrary, the Tokyo Cabinet assented to the project from the outset, making only one condition, namely, that Japan should share and share alike with other foreign countries in furnishing the capital and contracting for the materials. In fact, Japan simply asks for that equality of opportunity which she is now wrongfully accused of denying to others. It is against Japan then, that an exclusive policy is to be exercised, whereas the accusation is that Japan seeks to exercise that policy against others in this very case. Coming to Russia, it has to be admitted that she objects to the railway project, but no one would think of caviling at her attitude or denying her rights in this matter. A railway from Chinchow to Aigun would have been the opening of a new gate of access to Russian dominions, and would have had strategical importance of the highest character. Russia is absolutely justified in declining to endorse such a programme, nor can her reluctance be justly construed as in any sense subversive of the principle of Equal Opportunity. Especially has it to be noted that St. Petersburg softens its refusal in the Aigun direction by offering to sanction an alternative line giving direct access to Peking further west. Finally, not Russia alone, but also all impartial on-lookers must be puzzled to find in purely commercial and industrial motives an explanation of China's anxiety to build a long and costly railroad in a remote and unfrequented part of her dominions, while neglecting to similarly equip provinces where a crying need for such facilities plainly exists.

THE EFFECT OF "SCARES" UPON THE EMPIRE'S DEFENCE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 2.)

(COMMUNICATED.)

IT is significant how wide, one might almost say how universal, is the degree of attention attracted by the problem of the British Empire's defence. The circumstance may not unfittingly be taken as a tribute to the Empire itself—its unique composition, its unprecedented size. For no greater problem has as yet presented itself to the statesman or the student of welt-politik in any age than the maintenance, in that state of security from external aggression which is a necessary preliminary to development, of so vast and composite an Empire. The British public has, not infrequently, been made the butt of Continental humourists for its sensitiveness, not to say nervousness, on the subject of its own safety; but in view of the immensity of the interests involved, the scattered character of the Empire, and the potential menace comprised in the huge armies of Continental Powers which a turn of Fortune's wheel might render only too real, it is not surprising that an occasional "scare" should sweep over the people of the Island Kingdom. We do not say that every "scare" which, since the days of the Pall-Mall's "Truth-about-the-Navy" agitation, has stirred the inhabitants of Britain was fully borne out by the actual facts of the situation at home and abroad. But there has usually been some—and nearly always the same—foundation for these periodical panics, to wit, the neglect of the Navy as compared with the maritime progress of other Powers. And the further fact emerges that this neglect has more often than not to be laid at the door of a Liberal Ministry. This is perhaps not unnatural, seeing that the besetting sin of the Radicals for many years has been to set questions of so-called social Reform before those of national defence; but, it may pertinently be asked, of what use are a hundred measures of social Reform—Old-Age Pensions, Land-nationalisation and the like—if the country is liable at any moment to be overrun with foreign troops and become, in the historic words of Sir EDWARD GREY, "the conscript appendage of a more virile Power?" However, there is one thing worse, just as there is one thing better, than these periodical "scares." The greatest danger which can overtake a democracy dependent, as is the British democracy, upon a single line of defence, is the danger of apathy. To avert that perilous state, the relapse of a nation into indifference, various publicists have been moved, from time to time, to raise the voice of admonition. It is a curious fact that these warnings have come of late from the least expected quarters, and even from outsiders. Thus the veteran Socialist leader, Mr. H. M. HYNDMAN, has followed in the footsteps of Mr. ROBERT BLATCHFORD in urging the paramount claims of the Navy on the British taxpayers and, in a recent letter to the press, strongly advocates the floating of the suggested £100,000,000 loan for the purpose of putting the national safety beyond all question. But an even more impressive warning has come from an outsider, and that a man whose claim to speak with authority on such matters is universally recognized. We refer to the remarkable letter written to the Daily Mail by Admiral A. T. MAHAN, which, reproduced in pamphlet form, is being sold in England by the million. Admiral MAHAN points out the disadvantage under which the democracies of Britain and the United States labour, through their dependence on the continually shifting form of government by party majority, as compared with the "strong independent Government" of certain Continental Powers, and adds the following pregnant statement:—"While the popular tradition of the national need for a great Navy still supplies to some extent a steadying hand, nevertheless, to one following from a distance the course of British action in late years, it certainly has seemed that this conviction is less operative, that its claims to allegiance are less felt and more disputed." The American expert views as a happy sign of a correct appreciation of the problem the recent decision of the Labour Government in Australia that in time of war the Australian Navy should be at the absolute disposal of the British Admiralty; but he regards as ominous the lack of a corresponding disposition on the part of the British Labour Party at home; and, more than that, a tendency to undervalue the necessity of preponderant naval force even in European waters. Admiral MAHAN severely criticises the reduction of British naval strength in the Mediterranean—from eleven battleships in 1899 to six in 1910—"the weakening, almost to abandonment, of the most delicate yet very essential link in the system of the communications of the Empire." He foresees a time when "this reluctance to acquiesce in present naval requirements" may mean the passing of the Mediterranean out of the sphere of British influence, a retrogression which "will symbolise, if it does not at once accompany, the passing of the Empire." Yet if Britain fails to hold her own in the realm of Naval Power, and the Empire should fall, "let no man think that the sole responsibility will rest with the voters. . . . It will rest, above all, with the leaders who have feared to risk their political lives for the national welfare.....It will rest with those who have been false to the duty of leadership and wilfully blind to an overshadowing danger. Posterity will not spare them its curses." The question the reader will perhaps be putting to himself on perusal of these impressive sentences, is—do these warnings, and the "scares" to which they are wont to give rise, produce any practical effect? We have no hesitation in saying that they do. Not only do they stir the national conscience, and preserve the democracy from the fatal sleep of apathy, but they bear tangible fruit in the shape of ships and guns. The low-water mark in the matter of naval defence was reached in 1908-9, when provision was made in the estimates for only two armoured ships. With that anti-climax, the agitation for increased expenditure began. In that year's programme and the previous one, the total new construction ordered was 5 armoured ships and 7 small cruisers. In the two succeeding years (1909-11) the Estimates contained provision for no less than 15 armoured ships and 11 small cruisers, while four of the larger units formed the "contingent" programme, which was the direct result of the agitation. It is the official policy to sneer at the "scaremongers"—even Mr. McKENNA has referred in suchlike uncomplimentary terms to the patriotic leaders of these agitations; but they have nevertheless done yeoman service to their country. The British Navy is the better, and the British Empire the safer, for their persistent and unselfish efforts.

THE IMPERIAL ASPECT OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 4.)

IN the recent debate on the Woman Suffrage Bill, Mr. ASQUITH characterised the measure as "a leap in the dark." If the Prime Minister, in making that most appropriate allusion to the novel (not to say revolutionary) character of Mr. SHACKLETON's already doomed Bill, had intended to allude to the Imperial aspect of the proposed upheaval, he would have been eminently correct. Much was said, for and against the measure, in the course of a discussion rendered exceptionally interesting by the fact that it afforded the rare spectacle of party leaders on both sides of the House engaged in vigorous cross-combat; but sufficient stress was not laid on the effect any such extension of the franchise must exert on the Empire at large. The supporters of the Bill modestly described it as an "experiment" admitting no more than a million spinsters to the parliamentary register. The militant suffragists, with their accustomed lack of tact, gloried in the measure as constituting "the thin end of the wedge." For this unhappy phrase, with the significant admission it contains, the suffragists have to thank the mover of the Bill—the "wedge" of course being, as Mr. F. E. SMITH pointed out in another of his brilliant speeches, universal adult suffrage, with twenty-three million additional voters added to the register. It is obvious that such an extension of the franchise, in addition to upsetting the present balance of political parties, would place the supreme control of affairs in the United Kingdom in the hands of women. Serious though such a result must be, none at least of the advocates of the measure seemed to remember that the House in which they were debating does not merely represent a national assembly of the United Kingdom, but has to do duty as a species of Imperial Assembly, responsible for the control of vast masses of coloured races and for the general well-being and defence of the Empire as a whole. Female Suffrage has been adopted in a few minor States, such as Norway; in certain States of the North American Union, such as Colorado; and even in two of the self-governing Dominions of the British Empire. But the members of the Mother of Parliaments occupy a position very different from any of these. Neither Norway nor Colorado nor New Zealand is confronted with the difficult task of governing a coloured subject-race, nor are they saddled with the final responsibility of providing for the safety of other States than their own. The alleged success of the experiment in these countries—though it appears that in New Zealand the birth-rate has perceptibly decreased of late years, and there is now talk of assisted immigration of boys from the Mother-Country—forms no criterion for the United Kingdom in its unique rôle as the heart and nerve-centre of a world-wide Empire. Indeed the essentially dual nature of that Empire is becoming daily more apparent. It consists, in reality, of two distinct halves, the white self-governing Dominions, on the one hand, and the Dependencies, peopled for the most part by coloured races, on the other. Under the present system, which can only be described as a makeshift full of anomalies, the double burden of administering the Dependencies and of providing for the defence of Dependencies and Dominions alike, falls upon the Imperial Parliament at Westminster. For these reasons, the question of giving votes to women has to be considered in the light of its possible effects on the coloured populations of the Empire, and in its relation to the supreme necessities of defence. Now the British Empire already contains, in its various Dependencies, three hundred millions of Orientals who are opposed to government by women. If to the already tremendous difficulties of governing these subject races there be added the knowledge, on the part of these subject races, that their governors on the spot are subject to the control of a female majority at home, a serious situation may easily arise for those supporting the "white man's burden" in the outlying parts of the Empire. For on what does the prestige of the British Raj—from the potent proconsul to the humblest civil servant—ultimately depend, if not on force? The moral power which enables a single white official to order the destinies of thousands of coloured people is efficacious only by reason of the knowledge that behind that isolated ruler lie the whole resources of the British Empire. Translate that might, that ultimate appeal to force, into terms of petticoat government, and the prestige of the British Raj will wither into contempt. "Women," says Sir EDWARD CLARKE, "though they may be the equals of men in the world of science and of art, are unfitted to conduct the affairs of a great Imperial State, because the occupations for which they are by nature fitted excludes them from the opportunity of obtaining the necessary knowledge and experience." In the words of the KING's recent message to his people, "the foundations of the national glory are in the homes of the people." To transfer woman from her natural sphere, where her special qualities render her supreme, into the arena of political strife, where these qualities are at a discount, is at one and the same time to undermine those foundations and to threaten with ruin the whole fabric of the Empire.

CHURCH AND STATE AT WAR.

(The Japan Daily Mail, August 5)

HARD upon the drastic treatment of religious orders and the severance of all direct relation between Church and State in France, comes the news of a movement in Spain which, despite its apparently small beginnings, seems to be tending towards the same goal. A state of war exists between the Vatican, as the head of the Established Church in Spain, and a Liberal Ministry in Madrid; while, to give practical effect to the rupture, the Spanish Ambassador to the Papal Court has been recalled. The challenge implied in this action of the Madrid Government has been taken up by Vatican, and a despatch whose bellicosity ill consorts with its source has been issued, calling upon all good Catholics to support the Vicar of Christ in the impending strife. Fortunately this religious war bids fair to be bloodless—as wars go. Regiments and iron-clads cannot be brought to bear upon the Papal See, and, for the rest, the days of the Inquisition are past and gone. Nevertheless there is scarcely any limit to the bitterness which a religious warfare can call to its aid; and the friends of peace, or those at least who have preserved an open mind, while looking with regret upon the sorry spectacle, are asking where the rights and wrongs of the matter lie, and whether a speedy and satisfactory solution of the issues involved is not still within the sphere of possibilities. It would be a great gain if the Spanish Government's case could be entirely purged of all political and interested motives, but this, we fear, is impossible. In the first place, the PRIME MINISTER, Señor CANALEJAS, and his colleagues owe their installment in office to Liberal votes, and they are now being driven to action by the Liberal press. The tocsin of religious equality has been vociferously sounded, but there is reason to believe that something more than a desire for tolerance exists behind the specious cry, and that atheism, rather than Protestantism, is behind the movement. Doubtless any weakening of the bonds between Spain and the Papal Court would be hailed with satisfaction both by the Protestant and by the infidel; but we have it on the authority of a recent writer whose sympathies are evidently with the Spanish Ministry that "the (Liberal) papers are concerned as a rule not for the Protestant sectaries but for the freethinkers (sic), and the remedy they propose is the total withdrawal of the State subvention for the support of the Church, together with absolute freedom for lay schools, even those of anarchist tendency." On the other hand, commercial interests appear to be bringing pressure to bear on the Government, for, says the writer whom we have already quoted, "there is bitter complaint all over Spain among manufacturers and traders regarding the extensive business done by monks and nuns," and this because of the exemption from taxation enjoyed by these orders. These traders swell the cry of those "freethinkers" whose ultimate hope is that Spain should follow in the footsteps of France by effecting the extinction of all religious orders and turning their property into the coffers of the State. Few, we think, would maintain that, since France went over officially and, in a sense, nationally to irreligion, her condition has shown any improvement, moral or material; and while it may be conceded that the epithet "priest-ridden" applies with some force to the population of the Peninsula—as it does to certain parts of Ireland—the question still remains whether moderate reforms in this direction are not better than a national plunge into the outer darkness of atheism.

Meanwhile the Vatican bases its case upon the Concordat of 1851, which specifically provided that the Church might acquire property both real and personal in Spain, though a limitation was set on the number of orders thus privileged. Whether that limitation was, or was not, intended to be purely financial, is one of the points now in dispute; but it should be remembered that, ever since the signing of the Concordat, steps have been continuously taken by the State—most of them quite ineffectual—to lessen the influence and power of the Church, as represented by the various religious orders. Thus, the decree of 1902—which led to serious riots at Barcelona and the fall of a Conservative Cabinet at Madrid—stipulated for the immediate registration, or failing that, the dissolution, of all religious orders other than the few mentioned in the Concordat; and further laid down that all religious associations carrying on an industry must apply for licenses and subject themselves to taxation. It is the proposed rigorous enforcement of this decree, instructions for which action were transmitted to the provincial authorities by a Royal Order in May of this year, that has brought on the present crisis. The Government, which depends upon the support of the Liberals, puts the narrowest construction on the Concordat; while the Vatican, not unnaturally, interprets it in a widely different sense. In June sixty-two Bishops addressed a protest to the Prime Minister, expressing surprise that "when the nation is in a state of decadence, prostration and impending ruin," the Government should attack religious institutions instead of attempting to effect practical reforms calculated to improve the condition of the working-classes, and instead of doing something to diminish the number of "schools of atheism and centres of anti-military and anti-patriotic institutions, as well as those newspapers which strike at the roots of property, public order and family life." Nevertheless the Spanish prelates have expressed their willingness to abide by the decision of Rome. Unfortunately, if the latest telegrams are to be believed, the die has been cast, by the hand of the Pope, on the side of war. As the influence of the Church is still sufficiently great to nullify, if not to prevent, the execution of decrees of which it disapproves, there is every reason to fear that we are only at the beginning of a prolonged period of strife, similar to that which has for so many years embittered Spanish national life—only, if possible, a strife more general and more intense.

FOREIGN FIRE INSURANCE COMPANIES IN JAPAN.

The foreign fire insurance companies in Japan number 24 in all, and they constitute a menace to the business of their domestic rivals, says the Liberal News Agency. The particulars of the former's business records for last year are not available as yet. For the year before last, the Liverpool London and Globe Fire Insurance Co. received an income through insurance of 320,000 yen, the Commercial Union 206,000 yen, the New Zealand 160,000 yen, the Yorkshire 120,000 yen, the Phoenix 164,000 yen, and others under 100,000 yen. Appearances indicate that there has been some increase in their business ever since. The approximate cause for their recent expansion is that these foreign companies, having changed their principle of direct control, have entrusted Messrs. Okura, Yonei and other influential persons in Japanese circles with their business management, with the result of a sudden advance in the number of the insured. The domestic fire insurance companies, on the other hand, forced up their rate of insurance about June or July, 1907, a proceeding which was repeated in 1908, and therefore the insured no doubt have changed over to the foreign fire insurance firms whose rate is comparatively lower. In addition, there is another powerful factor in the situation, namely that the foreign fire insurance companies, which, on principle, entered into contracts only in the case of brick or stone buildings, have taken to insuring wooden houses as well, since they placed the direct management with Japanese agents. The domestic fire insurance companies have suffered by the bitter experiences of the Hakodate and Osaka conflagrations, and they do not, as a rule, show enterprise in undertaking risks thereby decreasing materially the number of the insured.

COMPETITION IN THE CAMPHOR INDUSTRY.

Reports have been received at Tokyo to the effect that orange groves in some parts of the Southern United States are giving place to camphor plantations. The cultivation of the orange tree is a matter of some difficulty and requires much labour and attention, while camphor trees grow readily. Camphor culture has always been a prominent industry in Formosa and Japan, and, since celluloid articles have come into such common use, this gum has become an indispensable article of industry.

It is interesting also to note that artificial camphor, when used in this manufacture does not give the same lustre as the natural gum. Germany and America are both large purchasers of Japanese camphor. But it is feared that Japan cannot much longer enjoy this monopoly, for it is a fact that camphor trees are being cultivated in sections of China. And now that this work is being taken up in the United States, it is recognized that Japan will have strong rivals in the field.

The Government is giving this matter earnest attention and it is thought that matters may be equalized by the manufacture, on a large scale, of celluloid goods in Japan. There are now two celluloid factories in this country; and Japan is, even now, exporting not only the raw material, but finished articles as well, and at a very satisfactory profit. It is a question in doubt, however, as to just how far this manufacture can be profitably carried.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

St. Petersburg, July 14.

The 2000 mile motor-car endurance test, with speed races by the way, was brought to a successful finish yesterday, thirty-three cars arriving in good order about two o'clock. The results of the test will be published in a week, after consideration by the jury. Col. Svechin, A.D.C. to the Emperor, who was commodore of the string of cars up to the moment of his accident near Chernigov, has so far recovered the effects of it that he has left for St. Petersburg, and will preside at the jury meetings. In the last run home a car that had all along attracted perhaps the largest amount of attention, from the fact of its being driven, with skill and great boldness, by a lady, the car of Princess Dolgorukova, was unfortunately disqualified on account of accidentally running into another car and damaging its radiator. The Princess arrived with the rest of the cars yesterday and received a great ovation from the crowd.

On Sunday, at Riga, will be celebrated with great pomp the 200-th anniversary of the annexation to the Russian Empire of Liefland. After a solemn service at the Orthodox Cathedral, at which the Emperor will be present, the Imperial party, with a brilliant suite and representatives of the local government of the Province, will proceed to open the new monument to Peter the Great, to the accompaniment of salutes from the guns of the warships in the harbour and forts, the ringing of all the church bells in Riga and the firing of a feu de joie by the assembled troops. The Court Ceremonial for the occasion puts at the head of the list of persons required to be present. "The President of the Committee of Ministers and members of the Committee (sc Premier and Cabinet), the president of the Upper House; President of the Duma", after whom follow the usual officers, court, military and civil, represented on ceremonial occasions in Russia.

A reduced tariff for 1st and 2nd class passengers on Russian railways comes into force to-day. The raising of the tariffs on passenger traffic, a couple of years ago, practically emptied the superior classes. It is hoped now to make them pay by a substantial reduction, while leaving the 3rd class rates the same.

Yesterday an 18 year old bride, ready dressed with her brides maids for church, was awaiting the arrival of the bridegroom when a note from him was brought to say, with brutal brevity, that he had "changed his mind." The girl fainted and on recovering ran into the kitchen seized a bottle of acetic acid and drank it off, dying on her way to hospital ten minutes later.

The Russian police are reported by a Moscow paper to have discovered a widely ramifying organisation throughout Russia, composed of lawyers, a notary or two, some government officials and many minor agents, who have been employing themselves with great success for years past in "recovering inheritances" by fraudulent means. The Government officials in departments dealing with intestates, etc., orphan trusteeships and the like, gave information of promising cases, and the lawyers, with the aid of personation and forgery, secured the inheritances for the "Company."

A "silly season" story in an Odessa paper tells how a peasant destroyed a stork's nest on his house, and the stork repaid him by filling his rooms with snakes which it took the united efforts of the villagers, clad in leather and armed with sticks, to clear out!

The Chinese Commission of Military Officers headed by a Prince of the blood, which has been investigating the military organisation of the armies of Europe, has arrived in St. Petersburg. A stay of some ten days will be made here, in the course of which facilities will be freely given to inspect the Russian system, and a grand review held at the Summer camp of Krasnoe Selo in honour of the distinguished visitors. After this the commission will proceed to Moscow and thence for home via the Great Siberian Railway.

In an interview a member of the commission has expressed the certainty that China, in a few years, will have an army organised on the most modern basis, and efforts are being made to arrange for universal military service. Already foreign instructors have been almost entirely dispensed with.

The two thousand mile motor car endurance test, with intervals of racing-tests for competitors, is drawing to a close. Thirty-four cars reached Tver yesterday and left early this morning on the last day's run, which, in many ways, will be one of the severest of the whole course. The arrival is timed shortly after noon to-morrow at Peterhof. Only fourteen cars, of the thirty-four still running, have any chance of prizes, the rest having been penalised in varying numbers of points for minor breaches of the regulations. One foreign competitor, angry at the action of the military officer who accompanied him on behalf of the control, took the opportunity when they were passing a desert waste, to declare himself no longer a competitor and turned his controller out of the car on to the roadside. Fortunately, a belated car came along after a time and rescued the officer from a decidedly embarrassing situation.

The Perna Regiment, permanently stationed at Moscow, one of the regiments enrolled by Peter the Great, is celebrating its bi-centenary, to which has been invited the "father of the regiment" a native of the Province of Kherson, a peasant old soldier aged 114 years.

Gen. Skhomlinov, Minister of War, yesterday inspected in the neighbourhood of Peterhof a small body of "boy soldiers," which is the outcome of the Russian attempt to imitate Baden-Powell's scouts. Here the children are taught, first and foremost, military drill and nothing has yet been heard of anything beyond the art of marching, handling a dummy rifle, and returning or giving the salute.

A Hull trawler has been brought into Archangel by the Russian guardship for having been caught fishing within the territorial waters limit off the Russian coast.

Circular tours on the Russian railways are being organised under the auspices of the Ministry of Communications. Circular tickets, covering not less than 1000 versts (c. 666 miles), available during 45 days, are shortly to be issued over Government lines, but privately owned lines have not yet come into the scheme.

Viscount Kamimura, Governor of Tokyo and formerly in command of the 5th army corps in the Russo-Japanese War is expected to arrive in a few days from Paris.

To-day was laid the foundation of a grandiose undertaking in memory of Peter the Great, at St. Petersburg, namely, the institution of what in the case of Moscow is called the "hospital townlet," a collection of hospitals for all kinds of specialities, enclosed in their own grounds, with separate sanitation, lighting, etc. The undertaking in St. Petersburg is to cover sixty acres of ground.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES

AN INTERNATIONAL LAWSUIT.

The world's greatest lawsuit was in process of being tried last month at The Hague. The litigants are the United States versus Great Britain, and Newfoundland fishing rights is the issue. The problem as to dominion over these waters, which has been an international thorn since the American Revolutionary War, is to be finally solved.

At The Hague Great Britain and the United States are fighting out their differences. Eminent lawyers of both countries are participating in the argument before the highest international tribunal in the world.

The fisheries controversy is the first case to be referred to the permanent court at The Hague for arbitration under the general arbitration treaty between the United States and England. The tribunal consists of the following members of the permanent court at The Hague:

Dr. Heinrich Lammasch, of Austria, umpire, president of the tribunal; His Excellency Luis M. Drago, of the Argentine Republic; Jonkheer A.F. de Savornin Lohman, of the Netherlands; Hon. George Gray, of Delaware, judge of the United States Circuit Court, and Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, chief of the Supreme Court of the Dominion of Canada.

The issues involved in the case are due chiefly to differences which have arisen between the two Governments as to the true intent and meaning of the provisions of Article 1 of the treaty of 1818, and are covered by the questions which are submitted in the special agreement for the decision of the tribunal.

REASONS FOR DISPUTE.

These questions are: It is contended on the part of Great Britain that the exercise of the liberty to take fish, referred to in the said article, which the inhabitants of the United States have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, is subject, without the consent of the United States, to reasonable regulations by Great Britain, Canada or Newfoundland in the form of municipal laws, ordinances, or rules, as, for example, to regulations in respect of seasons when fish may be taken, and the method, means, and implements to be used.

It is contended that the exercise of such liberty is not subject to limitations or restraints by Great Britain, Canada, or Newfoundland in the form of municipal laws, ordinances, or regulations unless they are appropriate and necessary for the protection and preservation of the common rights in such fisheries and the exercise thereof, and unless they are reasonable in themselves and fair as between local fishermen and fishermen coming from the United States, and not so framed as to give an advantage to the former over the latter class unless their appropriateness, reasonableness, and fairness be determined by the United States and Great Britain by common accord and the United States concurs in their enforcement.

The second leading question is: Have the inhabitants of the United States, while exercising the liberties referred to in said article, a right to employ as members of the fishing crews of their vessels persons not inhabitants of the United States.

QUESTIONS OF CUSTOMS ENTRY.

Question 3.—Can the exercise, by the inhabitants of the United States, of such liberties be subjected, without the consent of the United States, to the requirements of entry or report at custom-houses or the payment of light or harbour or other dues or to any similar requirement or condition or exaction?

Question 4.—Have the inhabitants of the United States the liberty, under the said article or otherwise, to take fish in the bays, harbours, and creeks on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to Rameau Islands, or on the western and northern coasts of Newfoundland from Cape Ray to Quirpon Islands, or on the Magdalen Islands?

Question 5.—Are the inhabitants of the United States whose vessels resort to the treaty coasts for the purpose of exercising the liberties, referred to in article 1 of the treaty of 1818, entitled to have for these vessels, when duly authorized by the United States in their behalf, the commercial privileges on the treaty coasts accorded, by agreement or otherwise, to United States trading vessels generally?

There are other questions of minor importance.

THROUGH RUSSIA TO CONSTANTINOPLE.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SOME FEATURES OF THE TURKISH CAPITAL.

The question was, "Where should I go?" A Christmas vacation of about seven weeks was staring me in the face. One must go somewhere. I was in Finland at the time, and happening to meet a friend of mine, he told me that a relation of his was going to escort his sister-in-law, who was an invalid, to Assouan, Egypt, via Odessa and Constantinople. He proposed to start the same day, calling at St. Petersburg, en route, for his sister-in-law. This decided me. A suggestion of this sort was what I had been waiting for. Constantinople it should be! The journey through Russia would be accomplished without any brain-fag on my part, as I should be travelling with Russian-speaking people, who would doubtless consider it their duty to look after me. The train started in two hours, so I at once proceeded "to pack my tooth-brush." Fortune favoured, and I caught the train splendidly.

A FORGOTTEN PASSPORT.

At Helsingfors, the capital of Finland, we engaged sleeping berths to St. Petersburg, and all seemed to be going smoothly, when I suddenly realised that I had come away without my passport. If I waited while I telegraphed for it, I should have to travel through Russia alone. On the other hand, the Russians, expecting trouble in Finland, were very strict at the Frontier, where we should arrive at about 7 the next morning.

A PLAN CONCEIVED AND CARRIED OUT.

My friend and I, with two or three others, discussed ways of getting through till about 1 o'clock in the morning, without arriving at any definite plan, when my friend said he would "sleep on it," and give the result in the morning. Strange to say, in the morning he had a plan. When asked for my passport I was to say (if anyone spoke English) that I had sent it by post to the Turkish Legation in St. Petersburg, to be viséd. When my friend was asked for his, he would say the same, we pretending to be strangers.

When we arrived at the frontier, the platform was lined with soldiers, and all the passengers had to alight and be searched for weapons. I was asked by a Russian Officer, in Russian, for my passport, and pretended not to understand, repeating over and over again the word, Constantinople, whereupon he swore, and sent me to a corner to wait, guarded by a soldier. When it came to my friend's turn to be searched, the officer, happening to catch sight of his trousers, which were turned up, at once concluded that he was an Englishman, and the following dialogue ensued.

Officer—Are you English?

My friend—No, I am a Finn.

Officer—[looking at his turned-up trousers.]

Are you sure you are not an Englishman?

My friend—Yes, quite sure.

Officer—Do you speak English?

My friend—Yes, a little.

Officer—Do you know that man over there?

My friend—[casting a casual glance in my direction.] No.

Officer—Ask him where his passport is.

My friend—[coming over to me and raising his hat after the most approved continental manner.] I believe you are English; can I help you at all? The Officer wants to know if you have a passport.

Myself—I have a passport, but I have sent it on to the Turkish Legation in St. Petersburg to be viséd.

My friend—[to the Officer.] He is going to Constantinople and has sent his passport on to the Turkish Legation in St. Petersburg to be viséd.

The Officer—H'm! Show me your passport!

My friend—As it happens, I am also en route to Constantinople and my passport is at the Turkish Legation too.

Officer—You don't know anything about this man?

My friend—Never saw him until to-day.

Officer—[not quite satisfied] H'm... well—[Engine blows its whistle; the Officer waves his hand towards the train, and we mount its footboard as it moves out of the station. The Officer stands looking thoughtfully at the moving train.]

On arrival at St. Petersburg, one of my friends lent me his passport, with which I travelled through Russia.

Much to my relief, my friend's sister-in-law didn't prove to be much of an invalid. She was supposed to be suffering from an ailment called "nerves."

WE LEAVE ODESSA ACCOMPANIED BY "PILGRIMS."

We left Odessa with about 150 "pilgrims" in the steerage from different parts of Russia; all bound for the Holy Land. The majority of them were very old men and one of them was blind. There were about 10 priests accompanying them. All seemed to be very poor, being dressed in the most primitive manner, in sheepskins, etc. They had their meals on the deck at long tables, and looking at them from the bridge one wondered at the zeal which had torn these old men from their homes to make what was, doubtless, to them, a perilous journey by land and sea, only to see a tomb. It was also rather pathetic to mark the gaze of the older white bearded men always fixed ahead as if they expected that all their troubles would be over when they had once set eyes on the Holy Sepulchre. They seemed to be such dear simple old fellows too, with absolutely no initiative; and it was most touching to see how, whenever anything occurred, such as—a bell ringing, a shouted order from the bridge, an increase of wind, or a particularly large wave approaching the ship—they invariably looked with dog-trustful eyes into the faces of the priests, who, by the way, didn't look in the least as though they merited it. Think how they must have pinched and denied themselves for years in order to save the amount necessary for the journey. But the saddest thing of all to contemplate, was the certainty that a large majority would be disappointed or disillusioned.

THE "PILGRIMS" ARE DISINFECTED.

About noon on the second day we anchored off the Bosphorus Quarantine Station, while the pilgrims were all loaded into the ship's boats with their belongings, and sent ashore to be washed and fumigated. [Such it is to be a pilgrim! The poor old men looked very helpless and frightened as they were hustled into the boats and packed like sardines. But, evidently, they didn't have such a bad time as they thought they would, for they returned looking quite perky, and some mounted the companion with quite a jaunty step, their cheeks being quite rosy from the bath, which must have been quite a novel experience to them, considering the enormous difference it had made in their appearance, and there was quite a reckless dare-devil light in their eyes.]

STEAMING DOWN THE BOSPHORUS.

By the time the pilgrims were all aboard and the boats taken in, the sun was getting well down; and it gradually darkened as we came down the Bosphorus to Constantinople, so that before we anchored in the Golden Horn, it had become quite dark, and the city was wrapped in mystery, which seemed, somehow, to be just as it should be, after the glimpses we had caught in the distance of tall, slender minarets, and here and there the enormous white dome of a mosque turned golden by the red sun as it lowered itself slowly and, as it seemed, reluctantly behind the city. And what a sight it had been! For hours we had steamed slowly between two hilly shores, on our right, Europe, and on our left, Asia, undulating in the most wonderful and unexpected manner. Here, a hill sloping upwards in a graceful curve towards the city, and dropping suddenly as we came into view of a little bay sheltering a village, green, with white houses built one above the other, almost to the hill's summit, with a little mosque nestling in its centre. There, a gap in the Asiatic side, through which one saw a vista of brown hills through a blue haze.

NIGHT ON THE GOLDEN HORN.

On anchoring there was the usual commotion on board, hundreds of haika (small, highly coloured boats with a high curving bow) surrounding the ship which soon swarmed with hotel-runners, speaking every language under the sun, in their own way, of course, and a most villainous-looking brand of porter, dressed in dirty and ragged, but, nevertheless, picturesque, red and blue with the inevitable red fez. Not having decided where I was going to stay, and as my friends were going on to Alexandria in the ship, I elected to remain on board that night; so we escaped from the general hubbub and took refuge in the dining saloon, where dinner was just commencing. After dinner, when we came up on deck, a most surprising transformation had taken place. A religious festival or something of the kind was evidently on, and the minarets and domes of the mosques were outlined with lights, not electric, each one, as I afterwards found out, being a primitive little oil lamp in itself, composed of a small glass half full of oil with a wick held in position by a bent piece of tin. The night was warm and till the small hours of the morning we sat on deck and talked, wondering what we should see the next day and what our impressions would be of this city of our dreams, which, by the way, from what we had read in the newspapers and heard from people who had never been there, had become modernised since the revolution, while even the women went about unveiled and everything was new and clean and civilized, and altogether prosaic and horrid.

SUNRISE.

The captain recommended us to get up early next morning and see the sunrise, which, he said, was a sight not to be missed; so we made a tremendous effort and got up at about seven, nor did we have any reason to regret it. The sun had just managed to peep between the base of a minaret and a dome of one of the mosques, very red and very proud of itself; instinctively we turned to see the effect on that part of the city on which the sun was shining. It was really a most unforgettable picture, and it is futile to attempt description. Nearly all round us, hills crowned by mosques; the tall houses, every possible shade of red, yellow and brown, commenced from the water's edge and rose tier upon tier until they reached the top of a hill on the summit of which was invariably a mosque, worn white and grey with age, but with a gentle flush this morning, lent to it by the young sun for the occasion, with its one, two, three, four or five tall and stately minarets, tapering to the sky, grouped round it, like daughters who, as my friend said, "I suppose will some day grow into matronly mosques with families of their own." The contrast of the chaste-coloured, huge round domes of the mosques with the sharp angularity and varied colours of the houses made an effect of almost startling beauty, both in form and colour. Added to this the golden Horn was covered with countless haika of the most brilliant reds, greens, yellows, and blues, moving to and from the ships at anchor, and across the Horn between Galata, the newer portion of Constantinople, and Stamboul.

ARMENIANS AS PORTERS.

At about 9 o'clock the guide we had selected as the least villainous-looking, called a haika and we were rowed ashore. After passing through the customs my luggage was packed on the back of an Armenian who wore a sort of saddle for the purpose and must also have had a special sort of back. This is the particular occupation of the Armenian in Constantinople. Very little of anything is transported on wheels, owing to the steepness of the streets; and it is no uncommon sight to see an Armenian being loaded with a case or bale of goods which takes four men to lift it on his back. Here and there stones are conveniently placed where he can rest his burden without unloading it. After the massacre of Armenians a few years ago, the merchants and store-keepers were much hampered and put out by lack of porters, as the Turk will not enter this profession,—he considers that his limit. Of course, the Turks had not thought of this, but at any rate it seems to have taught them a lesson, because there have been no massacres of Armenians since.

THE EMANCIPATED TURKISH WOMAN.

Outside the custom house were droves of donkeys, arriving or departing, packed with coal, lime, building material etc., being driven by the most villainous-looking men I ever saw. We took a two-horse carriage—there are no one-horse—to my hotel and then called at the Post Office for a letter my friend's sister-in-law was expecting from a relative of hers, who had married a Turkish official of some sort and who, she thought, might be very useful in showing her round, etc. The letter was there. In it she gave directions how to get to her house, and said that she would be very pleased if my friend's wife would call on her, but that she was on no account to bring her husband, as she couldn't possibly receive him, it being contrary to the Mahomedan law for a woman to be seen by, or speak to, any man excepting her own husband. This rather staggered us, not seeming to fit in with what we had heard of the New Turkey.

THE GALATA BRIDGE.

Our guide then drove us down to the Galata Bridge, a floating bridge from Galata to Stamboul. This is the bridge on the Galata end of which, a day or two after the Young Turks had captured Constantinople, a number of unpopular officials were hanged and left dangling for several hours, for the public to gaze on, showing them the folly and danger of becoming unpopular. It is one of the most interesting places in Constantinople and a splendid view is obtained from the middle of the bridge. It is also the main thoroughfare between Stamboul and Pera, the oldest, and the newer part of the City respectively, and always crowded with representatives of every nation in the world. The ferry steamers running to different parts of the Bosphorus start from the middle of the bridge.

Each person has to pay 10 para, equal to about a half-penny, to cross, and the toll is collected by a chain, of about 8 men, stretched across at each end, no change is given, though one can get it at a little office near by. Only about 50 per cent. of the people seemed to pay however; some appeared to be friends of the toll-collectors, others looked too important to pay, some seemed too poor to pay, and a few obviously watched their opportunity and smuggled themselves through. On this bridge we received one of our disillusiones. The Turkish woman does not go unveiled since the revolution; in fact, she is covered from head to foot in a kind of nun's robe, generally black, but sometimes of some neutral tint, with a thick black veil completely covering her hair and face, and the most one can see of a Turkish woman's face is, perhaps, a suggestion of bright eyes through the veil, if one is very enterprising. I spent a whole month in Constantinople and never saw a Turkish woman in the streets unveiled. The Turkish woman never walks in the streets with her husband or any other man, excepting, on some occasions, a black servant as protector. The Turk thinks it beneath his dignity to be seen walking with a woman.

STAMBOUL.

On arrival at the Stamboul end of the bridge, we dismissed the carriage and walked to the Great Bazaar. During this walk we got some idea of the real Constantinople. Imagine tall houses each side of a narrow street about 12 or 15 feet wide, densely crowded, with, here and there, deep holes filled with slimy water, although the weather was warm and dry; heaps of awful-smelling garbage; dogs lying about everywhere, some covered with awful sores; crowds of hawkers shouting out their wares. Yet, withal, an intensely interesting scene and full of colour from the blue clothes of the working man, and the red fez which every Turk wears, whether in European dress or national costume. Here, all kinds of dried fruits, nuts, oranges, lemons, sweets, etc. can be bought at the most ridiculously low prices. Our guide took us into all the most interesting shops in the Bazaar, in the hope of getting commission, I suppose. But really, as regards curios, there is not much variety. Carpets and mats are by far the most tempting, and are really fascinating and beautiful, but it is difficult to put a turkey carpet in one's kit-bag. The Turks seem to have no art—in the European acceptance of the word—which is rather surprising; and certainly, no music.

WE ARE "TAKEN" SIGHT-SEEING.

After leaving the Bazaar, the guide took revenge for our having disappointed him in not having purchased large quantities of curios—and took us sight-seeing. First, to the famous mosque of Saint Sophia, about 1,000 years old, which was at one time a Christian Church. Here while we wanted to revel quietly in the wonderful mosaics with which the walls and roof are covered, and take in the beauty of the immense dome and the wonderful idea of space it gave, our cicerone poured forth a stream of dates and data, in execrable French; coming very near us, his breath smelling vilely of garlic. He was really most insistent. If he thought the attention of one of us was wavering, he would touch the guilty one on the arm and say, in an angry and reproachful tone, Monsieur! Attendez s'il vous plait! and the one detected would start guiltily from his abstraction and make a fresh effort. But he really was a tyrant. It was my first experience of guides and it will be my last. It makes my head ache now to even look at a guide.

HOW TO QUALIFY AS PILGRIMS.

In the courtyard of this mosque the pilgrims collect before commencing their journey to Mecca, and a priest showed us an acrobatic feat that all the pilgrims have to perform before they are eligible to make the pilgrimage. Round the mosque, in the courtyard, there is a kind of veranda, the floor of which is raised about a foot above the pavement of the courtyard; at the edge of this, one of the pillars, about 4 feet in diameter, which supports the roof, juts out about 2 feet on to the courtyard. If you want to make the pilgrimage to Mecca, you must stand with the pillar on your right, your back to the veranda, place your left foot where the pillar meets the edge of the veranda, and bring your right foot to a similar position on the other side of the pillar, disengage your left foot, and then gain your equilibrium also on the other side of the pillar, without descending into the courtyard, which a Christian generally does. The priest, who demonstrated this to us, seemed to be very good at it, and did it several times for our edification, and smiled pityingly and in a superior sort of way at our futile attempts. Of course, the pilgrims performed this feat without shoes, but notwithstanding this, a deep smooth hollow was worn in the solid stone each side of the pillar. But our enjoyment of this innocent and religious sport was not long. Our guide cut short our efforts at qualifying for pilgrims, at which he had been looking with a disapproving eye, saying, il faut aller messieurs! il faut aller! nous n'avons pas de temps maintenant!

THE TYRANNY OF GUIDES.

That was the last spark of enjoyment we had that day. Our tyrant took us from one place to another, continually pouring dates and data into our ears. Always, just as we felt restful and contemplative beneath the dome of some silent mosque, dotted here and there with prostrate devotees, offering up silent prayers, a touch would be felt on the arm and a reproachful voice would say—Monsieur! attendez s'il vous plait!—and we would try to take an intelligent interest in his historic dates and accounts of the fabulous worth of the carpets we were standing on. But everything comes to an end. About four o'clock we anchored in Tokatlian's, the only decent restaurant in Constantinople, for tea and refused to budge—and as were in the European quarter we felt we had the whip hand—and accordingly dismissed our cicerone, after paying him gratuitously for the remainder of the day. Then we heaved deep sighs and commenced to enjoy ourselves. I'm afraid our friend the guide thought us very unsatisfactory as tourists, appallingly indifferent to dates, and not at all thirsty after knowledge. After my friends had left Constantinople, I wandered, day after day, by myself, over the city and its environs and often came across a place which in some dim way seemed familiar, and supposed that we had visited it some time during that nightmare of a day when we were dragged, unwilling victims, from mosque to mosque, with dates in our ears and garlic in our nostrils.

THE MOSQUE AND THE MUEZZIN.

The mosque is the striking feature in the panorama of Constantinople. But, apart from this, the city would not be without attractions, because of the surpassing beauty of its natural position, on a series of hills of the most perfect outline and symmetry of form imaginable, divided by half a mile of water, generally of the deepest blue, narrowing to a curved point in one direction and swelling in the other, to where, on the right, in the distance, one sees the cypresses on the Asiatic shore at Scutari, and, if your youth has not been misspent, you will remember that at this place, Florence Nightingale, during the Crimean War, heroically worked for the sick and wounded soldiers in the hospitals. Reverting to the mosques, it always seems to me as if the city was built first, and then, it was seen that one thing was needed to make the picture perfect. So this wonderful "crown" was put on the top of each hill, just as the last thing a beautifully dressed woman puts on, is her hat; till then she doesn't know whether she is a success or not. There is no clanging of bells to call "true believers" to prayers in the mosques; but you may be wandering aimlessly, about prayer-time, near one of them when you hear a voice, of the most wonderful clearness and purity of tone, which seems to come right out of the sky chanting a few notes and then chanting again; you try to locate it; it is repeated time after time, and at last you see a youth, high up on a kind of platform, round one of the minarets, like the fighting-top of a battleship. He is calling the people to prayers. But the charm in a large measure is gone with the solution of the mystery.

THE SULTAN'S PART IN TURKISH RELIGIOUS LIFE

Religion plays a very important part in the life of the Turk. It is this very reason which makes it so difficult for him to become westernized. The Ceremony of the Selamlık, which I witnessed on two or three occasions, is a queer witness of the power religion has even with Royalty. Every Friday, at 12 o'clock, the Sultan must go to a Mosque and pray. He is accompanied by the most important court officials, and his body-guard, with perhaps 2 or 3 regiments of infantry lining the route from the Palace. If the Sultan does not go, the people say "we have no Sultan." I suppose this is what prevents the Sultan from going abroad. Among the many stories told of the ex-Sultan, one is, that he had a man who impersonated him on these occasions.

THE EX-SULTAN AND HIS PALACE.

The ex-Sultan did not live in the palace on the Bosphorous, at present occupied by his successor, but at the Yildiz Kiosk, which is some distance from the water and sheltered by a hill. It is said that he was continually in dread of being bombarded by his own navy, and that, when he retired to the Yildiz Kiosk, he invariably had with him some essential part of the machinery of his men-of-war, without which the latter were impotent. Rumour has it that he never slept in the same room two nights following, for fear of assassins, and had no regular bedroom, but had couches in every room, so that no one need know in which room he would sleep.

I went round the Yildiz Kiosk one day. In the Harem, the women's part of the Palace and grounds, in which I am told the ex-Sultan spent many hours a day, there was an artificial winding river, on which was a yacht and several small boats, among which was one with a stern-paddle connected with the treadles of a bicycle in it, on which the ex-Sultan was particularly keen.

THE "TIME" DIFFICULTY.

In Russia, as everyone knows, the calendar is 13 days behind ours, which is rather awkward at times. In Turkey, however, the time is different, and most Europeans carry two watches, one each side of the waistcoat, on a single chain. What a paradise for the London pick-pocket, if he only knew it! When the sun sets, it is twelve o'clock by Turkish time, and as the sun sets at a different time every day, so must you alter your watch. There are many other queer customs which the average European hardly dreams of, which survive in this old-world city, in spite of "the Revolution," but space prevents me from alluding to them. A man I met in Constantinople, whom I asked to give me his opinion of the Turks, said, "Well, you see, they're so beastly sudden, you never quite know what they are going to do next; one morning they wake up and massacre the Armenians; and a few months ago, one night, the soldiers assassinated all their officers, when during the day everything had been quiet. To-morrow, they may wipe out the Greeks. One never knows. The great thing in this country is not to be unpopular."

THE LAYING OF THE GHOST.

(WITH APOLOGIES TO AN UNKNOWN JAPANESE WRITER).

Everybody in Tokyo knows Manseibashi. If he does not, he is no true Edokko. There may, however, be a few ignorant foreigners who do not know. I will enlighten them. Manseibashi is as near the centre of the modern city as can well be imagined. The centre used to be at Nihonbashi, the bridge from which all road-distances were measured, but there has of late years been such a great expansion, especially to the north and west, towards Hongo, Koishikawa, and Ushigome, that the centre of Tokyo has perforce shifted a little, and is now nearer to Manseibashi than to any other of the many bridges in the Japanese metropolis.

It is a very busy place, though at the present moment its real importance in the daily life of the city is somewhat concealed by the bricks and mortar of the municipal improver. It stands near the end of the great thoroughfare which runs from Shimbashi station, right through the centre of the business world. It is in close proximity to the largest vegetable market in Japan. It gives access, on the west, to the great booksellers' street that runs to the foot of the Kudan Hill; on the east, to the equally important centre of the old clothes and old bottle businesses, along a street which takes you right away to Asakusa. It is dominated by the Russian Cathedral and Kanda Myōjin, with its modern deity of loyalistic principles, and is within sight of the great trees in Ueno park. Five lines of electric railway converge at Suda-chō, within a hundred yards of the bridge, and in the course of the next few months, the overhead railway will be running its trains there to add to the bustle. It is not at all a place suggestive of ghosts.

Yet there stands, within a few hundred yards of Manseibashi, a house which, until quite recently was haunted by an alarming spectre. It is not an old house either; indeed it is so new that it has always, ever since its first erection, been fitted with electric light, so that the limits of its possible age can be well ascertained. It is, moreover, a convenient house (as Japanese houses go), and the demand for houses in the centre of the town is so great that, according to all laws of probability, it ought to have let continuously and well, and have been a source of steady income to its landlord. Instead of which, after one or two brief and fleeting terms of occupation, it remained untenanted year in and year out, with its still new shutters fast closed and a piece of paper pasted on its door to announce in sprawling letters that it was kashiyu, "to let."

The place was reported to be haunted. A white figure (whether of man or woman the reports did not say) could be seen at night close by the electric lamp which hung in front of the tokonoma in the upstairs sitting room. It always appeared shortly after the electric light was turned off, and its appearance was generally accompanied by strains of soft music like the tinkling of a ghostly samisen in the corridors and chambers upstairs. When the strains of this ghostly music (which was always sadly plaintive) had gone on for some time, footsteps of ghostly zōri, flapping along the boards, might be heard, and at last, towards the dawn, apparition and music would alike fade away, only to appear again on the following evening as the click of the electric burner told that the light had been turned off. There was, it is true, nothing very terrifying about the apparition; but conscience makes cowards of us all, and, moreover, the thing was apt to get on to the nerves of the inmates. So no tenant remained for more than a few nights, and finally the house became permanently tenantless.

No one ventured to explain the ghost. But many reasons were given why it was to be expected that the house should be haunted.

In the first place it contained a room with nine mats. That alone was enough to condemn the house. For the Japanese word for nine (ku) is the same in sound as the Japanese word for "pain" or "sorrow," so that there is an ill-omened something about a room with nine mats. It was said also that, during its brief occupancy by its first tenants, the house had witnessed the arrival into the world of a poor, little infant, an infant that was not wanted, and that had not been allowed to live out even a hundredth part of its allotted span of woeful existence. It was said moreover that there had been another tragedy, a life closed by suspension from a beam, in another of the upper rooms; that the well had been the recipient of the body of a suicide girl that an old pond now filled up had seen many horrors of infanticide in the "good old" days. No one troubled himself to investigate any of these rumours; but they were all believed, and the house stood empty.

At last a journalist took the matter in hand. A journalist, it is well known, is a brave and dauntless man, who sticks at nothing. Neither the frozen pole, nor the torrid equator, neither the majesty of the great, nor the squalor of the poor, have any terrors for him. He treads fearlessly wherever he goes, for he is always well armed. The pen is mightier than the sword and the goose quill which furnishes the former has always likewise been used for feathering the swift arrow that flies from the hand of him that is skilled in the use of the long bow. It was fitting that a journalist should take it on him to lay the ghost that haunted the house that the landlord had built in the purlieus of Manseibashi.

It stands to reason that when the bold journalist, resolved to stick at nothing, suggested to the landlord that he would lay the ghost or perish in the attempt, his suggestion was accepted with an alacrity which lost nothing by being just a little flavoured with no grains of the salt of doubt.

A dark moonless night in the month of March 1910 was chosen for the attempt. The brave knight-errant of the pen was admitted into the house by the landlord, about nine o'clock on a moonless night, as I have said before, and was safely locked in (a mere metaphor in a Japanese house) for the night, considering himself amply furnished in having a quilt or two, a pillow, a hibachi, a pailful of charcoal, a tallow candle, and some tobacco. For man must smoke wherever he is, and as the ghost only appeared when the electric light had been put out, the tallow candle was necessary to see him by.

Without knowing it, he pitched his tent in the nine-mat chamber at the foot of the stairs.

An hour or two passed, and nothing happened. Doubtless the ghost was reconnoitring before revealing himself to the stranger. Then,—it could not have been far from midnight—the wind arose in the streets outside—(my readers will remember what a windy March we had this year),—and with the rising of the wind there came to the journalist's ear the sound of music. Some one was playing a celestial samisen, an instrument evidently far superior to the poor material thing which the street musician twangs at the door of the charitable, and its cadences rose and fell, increasing in volume to a loud forte and then decreasing to the sweetest pianissimo, in a manner that filled his soul with rapture and terror. It was spiritual music, played by invisible hands, in the dead of night, in a ghost-stricken house. It had some deep meaning; there was something that those poor cadences wanted to tell. But it was impossible to read their import. Never before had a song without words made so heartrending an appeal to human sympathies.

Then came a sound that made him sit up on his quilts. The amado in the verandah upstairs slid open, so it seemed, and the flip-flap of a pair of ill-fitting zōri went blundering along the corridor and into the best upstairs room, the room with the tokonoma. As I have not mentioned any names I am not guilty of any breach of confidence in saying that the journalist owns to having been frightened. Every single hair stood on end separately and by itself, streams of cold perspiration trickled along his back-bone; he exhibited all the symptoms of being in a dead funk. But he was a man that would stick at nothing, and his courage finally saved him.

He lighted his candle, blew it out again, lighted it a second time, and blew it out once more, and at last, taking his life as it were in his hands, crept upstairs in the dark.

And there he saw it. Close to the tokonoma, just under the bulb of the electric burner, in the place of which rumour had said that it would be found, there stood the pale ghost-like figure of a human being. He could not tell whether it were male or female, for it seemed to be swathed in grave clothes; but it was undoubtedly the ghost of a human being, which had, in life, been five feet two or three inches in height and not over stout. It stood there perfectly still, in a defensive and defiant attitude, as though resenting the intrusion of this unauthorized stranger, and glanced at him with terrifying look of mute and motionless anger. The journalist stood his ground: he could indeed do naught else; for terror had deprived his nether limbs of the power to retreat; all he could do was to brace his nerves to the ordeal and resolve that come what would he would never allow it to be said of him that he had been stared out of countenance by a mere ghost.

So they stood facing each other, the man and the ghost, and neither of them seemed to have the power or the will to move. But the wind, or whatever it was, that had first wafted the celestial music to the house, seemed to die gradually away, and as it retired, the music withdrew with it, until he could just hear it faintly and fitfully as it suffered itself to be borne on the breezes to the place from whence it had come. Then once more the flip-flap of retreating zōri, followed by the stony silence and the stare of the defiant spectre.

How long he continued staring he never knew, but presently the sounds in the street below told him of the returning life of day, and as the dawn crept on, the defiant spirit vanished, fading gently and almost imperceptibly away. Nothing interposed now to bar his progress, and he at once resolved to explore the rest of the upstairs rooms. And this is what he found. A chink in the shutter through which a broadening ray of light from the electric lamp in the street would fall upon the upright pillar, of the tokonoma, so twisted and turned by the objects upon which it fell as to cast a patch of luminous white, not unlike a human figure; on the opposite wall a thin sliver of wood, loose at one end, and several loose tongues of paper in a broken shoji, which, moved by the gale, played the celestial music of the Aeolian Harp, and, in the back room, some loose sheets of paper and one or two ruined straw shoes, which had evidently been the playthings of rats.

The journalist now lives in a house near Manseibashi. He stoutly maintains that it is not haunted; but rumour says that the landlord lets him have it at a ridiculously low rental.

How well it would be if we could all be forced, as was our friend the journalist, to look the bogies of life steadily in the face. Even the toughest and most obdurate of them, such as the Yellow Peril, or the German scare, will be found to vanish before the steadfast gaze of the human eye fortified by the increasing light of knowledge. And knowledge is Power, and Power can be sometimes used for one's own advantage. And that is human wisdom. A.L.

CHINA NOTES AND NEWS.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE CONVENTION.

China-English newspapers generally do not appear to have much to say on this subject. They print the Articles of Agreement, make comments to the effect that they appear to be a confirmation of the existing treaty, and let it go at that.

The Peking Daily News reprints a somewhat facetious article headed "Robbery Under Arms," and beginning:

"At last we know the worst, and a bad worst it is too; though it might have been worse, and probably is."

After a rather caustic commentary on the terms and "intentions" of the Agreement, this article adds: "So far the agreement constitutes Japan and Russia into a Mutual Aid and Admiration Society," and closes with the expression "The only thing left for this country to do is to borrow Diogenes' lamp and go seeking her friends."

In connection with the suggestion quoted above, the following report by a Russian Army officer who is said to be well acquainted with Chinese military affairs is interesting. It is taken from a Russian paper.

"At the present time China can hardly be regarded as being strongly armed to an adequate degree. In a few years' time, however, a further conflict between Russia and Japan in Manchuria will be an impossible contingency, as China would interfere in its initial stages. Russia should therefore exert her efforts towards the development of her East Asiatic interests, at the same time seeing that no one threatens her in the West and that she herself, in her turn, does not threaten anyone. The military strength of China is the strongest influence in the political and military interests of Russia—which is very important to be kept in view. This condition of things will continue so long as the Manchu dynasty remains in power. For its defence the Guards and another division, stationed in Peking, are formed almost exclusively of Manchus. Nevertheless it must be admitted that the majority of the new Chinese national troops are not all that could be desired for the support of the dynasty. In South China, especially, a current of animosity towards the Manchus is observable. During the past eighteen months, on more than one occasion, whole divisions have mutinied. At any rate the Chinese army has now become one of the most important factors in Far Eastern politics."

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE IN CHINA.

It is interesting to note that an imperial edict recently issued in Peking has decreed English as the official language for scientific and technical education throughout the Empire. Under this decree all examinations for diplomas in the great educational institutions will be conducted in English, and it is predicted in diplomatic and commercial circles that the ultimate effect will be to make English the official language of China in her intercourse with foreign nations.

THE SHANGHAI WALL.

For some time Chinese newspapers have conducted a campaign for the removal of the Wall about the native city of Shanghai. They have apparently succeeded at last, for a Shanghai paper prints the following:

"The native city of Shanghai is going to lose the wall with which it is surrounded. It is needless to say that it greatly impedes the expansion of the city. It also gives the city an air of antiquity which makes it present a queer contrast with the Europeanized city outside the wall. Its removal has been proposed, but each time the subject was brought up it met with a strong opposition from conservative natives, who promptly organized a league called the "Paochenghui," which, as the name indicates, has as its object the preservation of the rampart. Time, however, has apparently removed the conservatism, and the proposal to take down the wall, which recently cropped up again, met with general approval, and official sanction has also been obtained. The native city will before long directly adjoin the French concession. By the way, rickshas have recently been admitted inside the wall, but the narrowness of the streets and the density of the population have made it unfit for rickshas. The prohibition of their use is now being proposed. The removal of the wall is expected to lead to the re-modelling of the streets."

Regarding the qualifying note which has been attached to the balance-sheet by the Auditors, the Directors do not feel it necessary to make any further explanations than have appeared in our previous Statements.

It will be noted by Shareholders that a further amount of yen 2,500 has been written off New Buildings Account for the present term, and it is the intention of the Directors that this process shall be continued in the future.

It is proposed that the dividend shall be paid on the 29th inst., on which date warrants will be issued.

Yokohama, 30th June, 1910.

C. H. H. HALL, }
G. W. COLTON, } Directors.

We have examined and audited the Books and Accounts of the Grand Hotel, Limited, for the half-year ended 30th June 1910, and herein beg to report that the above Balance-sheet is correct, except an item of 47,500.00 yen, to which the Shareholders' attention is drawn, representing expenditure on a set of Architect's plans and model for New Buildings, and as no use has been made of these Plans and Model since they were acquired some years ago, we are of opinion that the value of these Plans should be either written off entirely, or very substantially reduced out of Revenue.

In accordance with the Company's Act 1907 we hereby certify that we have obtained all the information and explanations which we have required.

PEARSON, MACKIE & DEMPSTER.
Chartered Accountants.

Yokohama, 15th July, 1910.

In moving the adoption of the report and accounts the Chairman of the Company, Mr. D. H. Blake, referred with satisfaction to the improvement in the affairs of the Company, as shown by the dividend, and by the increase in the volume of travel, which, though slight, was welcome. The Chairman's motion, seconded by Mr. B. C. Howard, was carried unanimously, and the proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the Directors.

We are informed by Messrs. Crosse Heath and Vogt, the legal advisers of the Company, that the Yokohama Ice Works Limited, the subscription list for which closed satisfactorily on the 15th instant, was registered in Hongkong yesterday. The business has been run in the interests of the Company by Mr. Stornebrink since the 1st instant, and all the assets of the business will now be transferred into the name of the latter so soon as the formalities can be completed.

THE USES OF DIVORCE.

AN EPITOME OF RECENT OPINION.

One of the most important, perhaps the greatest, question before Modern Society, is this "Divorce Habit." That it is recognized at last in its really serious, vital character is evidenced by the Royal Commission of eminent and scholarly citizens who are discussing it in London, and by the agitation which respectable American papers are making against the atrocities of the Reno Divorce Courts.

This question is so vital and so close to the very foundations of society that few people seem to be able to discuss it coolly, most expressions being very radical on one side or the other. The one extreme is the clerical view put before the London Commission, well pictured in the following passage from the London Daily Mirror:

The Divorce Commission continues its sittings regularly. Its full reports will certainly, in future years, form a remarkable summary of expert opinion, as it was at the beginning of the Twentieth Century, on a vitally interesting subject. This opinion, in its diversity and contradictions, will be hard to summarise; and at present such a summary is impossible. Yet, even now, the witnesses may be grouped together in accordance with the views they hold. Sometimes the views of a single profession seem to agree. Take the curious, instructive case of the clergymen: They are, on the whole, of the same mind. What do they say about divorce?

They unite in condemning it. But that is not all. They feel themselves bound, no doubt, to oppose an adaptation of the law, which was made by man, to the possibly altered needs of the men who made it. They are right, at a time when freedom is a word too freely used, to keep the courage of their convictions, and to advocate not a loosening but a tightening of the legal bonds if they really believe in that policy.

What we want to speak of, wonderingly, rather, is the manner in which they advocate this tightening. That manner is a fiercely severe insistence upon further punishments, further disabilities. "Judge not," says the central maxim of the creed they follow. "Judge, and judge harshly," say the exponents of that creed to-day. "Cast no stone," says the true, original doctrine: "before condemning the sinner, be sinless; first, yourself." "Punish infidelity with imprisonment," says one clergyman. "Punish women who sin," says another, "more severely than men. Their sin is greater." "It is better," says a third, "for injured husbands to live in a barbarous time because, then, they can shoot those who injure them." "Keep divorce from the poor," say other "Christian" voices. Shut up barriers,—close up hope,—be severe,—judge,—punish!

So, after many centuries, speaks the denunciatory wisdom of righteousness. Harshly they preach the word of Him who was harsh upon no sin, except the sin of harshness—of Him who was severe alone upon those who judged their fellows and sought to punish by external penalties and man-made tortures, here and now. It is strange, and we may be forgiven our wonder at it, that always, when we read of punishments advocated, judgment exceptionally stony and ferocious, there speaks a clergyman who professes to follow the Gospel of forgiveness and of judgment deferred: the Gospel that persuades us to correct our own vices, before seeking to remedy the vice of other people.

In other words, a large portion of those whose opinions are going to be taken by this Investigating Commission as the standard of public feeling, are insisting that people once married must be bound to each other for life. All interest in each other, all love, even all mutual interest in their surroundings may be lost! they are married, compel them to live together; They may be utterly unable to live in peace together—let them quarrel! The very sight of each other may awaken no feeling but abhorrence and disgust, almost hatred—let them endure it!

Opposed to this is the disgraceful situation in Reno City, Nevada, where the "Divorce Colony" is one of the industries of the town—a situation which has aroused such a storm of indignant protest that it cannot much longer endure. This also is best shown in extracts from American papers.

"The thing that has brought Reno's notoriety and prosperity, her shame and her pride—in short, her divorce colony—is this little paragraph in the Nevada statutes:

"Divorce from the bonds of matrimony may be obtained by complaint, under oath, to the District Court of the country where the cause therefor shall have accrued, or in which the defendant shall reside or be found, or in which the plaintiff shall reside, if the latter be either the country where the parties last cohabited, or in which the plaintiff shall have resided six months before suit be brought, for the following causes."

The causes for which divorce may be obtained are practically the same as elsewhere. It is in this little paragraph that lie dormant the possibilities that the enterprising Schnitzer awoke into life to make Reno famous. Without it Reno might have remained just a place you pass through on your way to San Francisco. But with it Reno seethes and bubbles with dissension and scandal.

William F. Schnitzer, the man to whom the fame is due for making Reno notorious as the divorce center of the universe, about four years ago examined the Nevada law from every angle and marked out Reno for his own. He got out an elegant little pamphlet in which he explained that "being a resident of Nevada for six months doesn't mean that one must reside for six months within the State. The party can take up a bonafide residence and travel where he will, so long as he regards his Nevada residence as his home."

Also he informed the eager seeker after freedom that "almost anything from which a lack of harmonious relations may be reasonably inferred is sufficient ground for divorce in Nevada." He advertised his pamphlet everywhere that he thought the advertisement would catch the eye of possible clients.

The practice has gone to such an extreme, that according to the correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle at that city "trains are met by automobiles, and a newly arrived divorcee is sought, entertained, amused, courted, flattered and beguiled by rival lawyers until her case is captured by one them."

It will be interesting to all right-minded people to know that Mr. W. F. Schnitzer, the man to whom this situation is especially due, is at present facing the possibility of disbarment, a petition to that end having been filed with the Supreme Court of the State.

Reno sentiment about its divorce colony, and its very real notoriety as a divorce centre, is so divided that it makes a split in politics, arguments and discussion among business men, coldness in social relations, and even extends into the university life, where co-eds have officially put themselves on record as disapproving of the divorcee, individually and collectively.

One of the leading business men expressed the whole selfish nauseating situation in the following words:—

Reno would be a dead town but for the divorce colony. There are about three hundred people in the colony, most of them with nothing to do but spend money, and they have it to spend. They bring it and leave it here. Why, if they spent only $1000 a year apiece that would be $300,000 a year, and $300,000 a year spent in a town of 12,000 people counts for something. We'd miss it if it were suddenly cut off.

"As a matter of fact, the divorce colony spends more than that. Some of its members are poor, it is true, and don't spend very much, but the rich ones are lavish; they have to find amusement; they want to live in the way they've been accustomed to live, and they put their money into circulation. Where one will spend $1000 others will spend $10,000.

But the days of Reno's disgraceful prosperity are numbered, for an action is now being taken before the State Legislature to amend its laws so as to absolutely prevent these possibilities.

Between the two extremes—Reno's "divorce mills" on the one side and the life-long torture advocated by the London clergy—comes a refreshing bit of common sense in the expression before the Commission, of Mr. A. C. Plowden, who is credited with being the best known of London's metropolitan magistrates. We quote a portion of an article containing his views:—

"Marriage should be encouraged in every way and divorce should also be encouraged—not for its own sake, but for the sake of marriage. Both are part of the same question.

Mr. Plowden was in favour of divorce by mutual consent when the union had broken down and life had become absolutely intolerable.

No witness had proposed so sweeping a change in the divorce law as this authority, for he would grant divorce for "any clear breach of contract," and breaches of contract were infidelity, persistent cruelty, bigamy, but not crime or lunacy.

Mr. Plowden gave utterance to his views in a series of epigrams. Some of them were:—

Marriage could not hope to be a working success if divorce was not in the background.

With divorce as a protection, marriage became a wise investment; without that protection it was a dangerous and mad gamble.

Divorce should really be looked on as something consolidating the marriage.

Divorce is no less a social necessity than marriage.

There is no marriage, however carefully arranged, which is not an experiment.

Mr. Plowden, however, was in favour of some check upon marriages, and agreed with the suggestion that no marriage should be legal unless performed before a registrar or some civil officer. That would make the contract more binding.

In this last paragraph appears to be the pith of the whole question, for so long as marriage is made so easy, "Divorce Mills" will be in demand.

MUSIC AT THE "HOTEL DE PARIS."

On the 29th ult. another of these delightful soirées took place at the above Hotel, which is rapidly gaining for this popular hostelry the reputation of being one of the most charming pleasure resorts during the hot summer evenings.

The large, gaily decorated and brilliantly illuminated gardens, are particularly well adapted for these open air concerts, which have been such a success this summer;—the Band of the German mail steamer Kleist rendered a very fine programme on this occasion, and must be accounted as one of the very best which has been heard lately in Yokohama; they certainly excelled themselves on Friday night, especially in the Overture to the opera, "Marinella;" the Pot-pourri from "Traviata;" the "Kreuzzitter Fanfare;" the Overture to "Zampa" "Die Post im Walde," and others although it would be difficult to select any number from the total of eighteen given, which did not reflect the greatest credit on the musicians and the able conductor of the band of the steamer Kleist. It is almost superfluous to state that the special dinner provided on this occasion was quite up to the standard of the Hotel de Paris, while the special Bar fitted up in the gardens was kept very busy in supplying the 200 guests and visitors with sherbets and other refreshing beverages.

It is the proprietor's intention to renew these Concerts periodically during the season.

RAILWAY AND COMMUNICATION RETURNS.

According to the investigation of the Railway Board, the number of passengers conveyed by various lines during the second ten days of July was 3,318,292 in all, while the amount of freight reached 647,328 tons, which shows an increase of 62,960 in the number of passengers and of 26,318 tons in the amount of freight, as compared with the corresponding period of last year. The passenger receipts amounted to 1,159,146 yen and the freight to 1,078,444 yen, with an increase of 14,112 yen and 74,167 yen respectively, as compared with last year.

During the year of 1907 the Government's income derived from mail, telegraph, telephone, and such other business amounted in all to 41,944,000 yen as against 37,463,000 yen in the preceding year. The largest increase of all was some 3,000,000 yen, obtained from telephone business.

MEETING OF THE JAPAN MISSION OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH U.S.A.

The West Japan Mission of the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A., one of the largest Missions in Japan, held its annual session at Ninooka, near Gotemba, from July 24th to 27th. All the work of the mission is south of Kyoto except two stations on the west coast. There were forty members present who reported the work in all parts of the field in a prosperous condition. The opening sermon of the moderator, Dr. A. D. Hail, of the Osaka Station, was of the highest order and a fit introduction to a most interesting and harmonious session. This is probably the last meeting of the West Japan Mission, as such, since it was voted to unite with the East Japan Mission of the same church, whose field of work is in, and north of, Tokyo.

Perhaps the most important question that occupied the attention of the Mission was that of village evangelization. Rev. Harvey Brokaw, of Kure, read a most carefully prepared report of a committee appointed one year ago to investigate conditions and needs of the rural population.

This report showed that at least 75 per cent. of the population of Japan has been entirely untouched by Christianity and that these people are largely in the country villages.

The difficulties and methods of work were considered and the conclusion reached that the time had come for the missionaries to make a systematic effort to give the truths of Christianity to the rural communities as well as to the people dwelling in the larger towns and cities. This report was unanimously adopted by the Mission which thereby committed itself to advanced effort along this line.

Few changes were made in the location of missionaries. Rev. J. G. Dunlop and family were changed from Fukin to Kanazawa, Rev. G. W. Filton D.D. and wife, returning from furlough, were assigned to Osaka and a new family was located at Yamada, Miss Luther was located at Seoul, Korea.

Rev. Harvey Brokaw was elected Moderator for the ensuing year.

THE AMERICAN CONSUL-GENERAL ON TOUR.

The Hon. Mr. Sammons, the U.S. Consul-General at this port, left here last night on a two or three weeks' tour of Industrial Inspection in his Consular district, comprising the Hokkaido and Saghalien. The interesting and voluminous trade in railway-sleepers between Japan and the U.S.A. increases year by year, and affords a curious and profitable shipping enterprise, inasmuch as the same ships which carry the Japanese oak railway-sleepers to the U.S. bring back American railway-sleepers to Japan for reshipment to China.

But besides the investigation of the local conditions surrounding the trade in this staple article, Mr. Sammons will collect data about the many industries which have lately sprung up in the Hokkaido, for the purpose of embodying the results thereof in his official report, as these reports furnish about the only reliable sources of information for the guidance of American manufacturers and merchants, and have proved to be of inestimable benefit in the opening up of new industries and new markets. The coal mines and steel industry in the Hokkaido, together with the all-important fishing industry and its various trades springing therefrom, will also engage the attention of the Consul-General. The newly discovered oil-fields in Saghalien and the exploitation of the same are, of course, a subject of particular interest to American financial and industrial circles, and will no doubt receive all the attention they so richly merit; while it will be of particular interest to the world at large to hear on his return, what the Consul-General has to say about the development of the resources of Southern Saghalien since it, passed into the hands of the Japanese.

YOKOHAMA AND KOBE.

FUTURE PROSPECTS OF THE TWO PORTS.

Mr. Yamazaki, Chief of the Yokohama Customs, is reported to have made the following interesting comparison between the ports of Yokohama and Kobe from the standpoint of foreign trade. "People are now saying," remarked Mr. Yamazaki, "that the future of Kobe is brighter than that of Yokohama as regards foreign trade, and they base their statement on a belief that Yokohama has reached its limit of progress. My observation leads me strongly to the belief that this is not so, and I can support my opinion with figures. In 1909 the total of the exports and imports of Kobe was yen 310,000,000 while in Yokohama during the same year the figure reached was yen 340,000,000,—or yen 30,000,000 in favour of Yokohama." The belief in Kobe's brilliant future we quote from the report given in our Southern evening contemporary) and is chiefly based on the extraordinary progress made by the port during a certain period, notably the years immediately following the war between China and Japan. The annexation of Formosa, and the increase in the volume of trade, gave an impetus to foreign trade in Kobe which soon carried it to a figure which may be taken to represent maturity. Yokohama has still potentialities of great advancement, which will be especially evident on the completion of the Panama Canal.

JAPANESE PAPER.

In addition to the present over-production of Japanese paper, the newly established Komachi factory, the Hokkaido branch of the Oji paper mill, will add to the supply. This plant has a horse-power of 7,000 for its operation. At present, few paper mills over the country are running to their full capacity and this condition must, apparently, become worse and worse. The Japanese do not use nearly so much paper as other nations, the average here being only 4½ pounds per person, per annum. Mr. Ono, of the Fuji Paper Mill, together with his fellow-traders, is now exerting himself to his utmost to find new markets. It is thought a field for the Japanese product may be found in China. However, at the present time that market is completely monopolised by German paper.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AID TO THE DROWNING.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The coming of the season for sea bathing with its dangers makes it advisable to recall some facts that ought to be generally known, but to which it is necessary to call the attention of each succeeding generation. Many emergencies must be met before they come, or not at all. If one has seen the fear that possesses a person who finds himself sinking, that one will recognize the necessity of having sufficient knowledge to enable him to keep a cool head.

In the first place, some general cautions are obvious, but the young often neglect them. A person who cannot swim should not go into water that comes above the armpits. A sudden depression in the bottom may bring his head under water and cause a panic resulting in drowning. All the time of one who cannot swim should be given to learning how to swim in shallow water, and beginners should swim along the shore. They should not dive at all except when one competent to assist in case of an emergency is in the water with them.

The observance of these elementary precautions may detract from the excitement of bathing, but they should be rigidly insisted on, and every boy and girl ought to be enabled to become a good swimmer.

With regard to saving a person from drowning, the following is quoted from a recent number of the Youth's Companion. It should be added that in case of surf making it difficult to swim in with the rescued person it is far better to swim along the shore in the smooth water outside the surf until assistance can be brought.

"As a rule, the people who have to be saved from drowning are those who cannot swim. They are almost sure to be temporarily insane from fright, and their first act is to grab their rescuer about the neck and hang on with more than normal strength. So the most important thing a swimmer should know about life-saving is how to prevent or break this deadly grip.

"First, to prevent it. The ideal way is to approach the drowning person from behind, reach under his left arm with your left hand. Whichever way he turns, he will be unable to reach you with his free arm. This grip has the advantage of throwing you upon your back in the water, and leaving you one free arm and two legs with which to tread water or swim until help comes, or your charge faints or becomes reasonable.

"But it is not always possible to approach the drowning man from behind. Coming from in front, and seeing that you are in danger of being grabbed, grab first! Reach for an arm or wrist; grasp it with both hands and twist hard and quickly. If you get his right arm, twist to your right, and if the left, twist to your left. You will be surprised at the suddenness with which the drowning person will turn his back on you.

"It may happen that in spite of all you can do, the person you are trying to save will succeed in getting his hands or arms about your neck. Keep cool, and try to sink, of course holding your breath. Sometimes the frightened bather, feeling the water close over his head, will let go and try to get to the surface. If he does not do so, draw your left foot up and get your left knee worked in between the two bodies, making enough room for your right foot against his chest. And no matter how strong fright has made his arms, you will find the powerful muscles in your leg much stronger. If it is a girl or a woman you are saving, try to put your foot high and in the crotch of her chest, otherwise a hard kick may have serious consequences.

"There are times, however, when you can neither grasp from behind nor break a deathclutch. You may be too far out of breath from fast swimming when you reach the drowning one to take any chances under water. The last resort in such cases is to disable, by knocking senseless, the one you are trying to save. Strike hard and coolly. Mere aimless pounding of the head will not do any good.

"Crouch low in the water, give a powerful kick with your legs and a downward blow with your arm, thus momentarily getting your body high out of the water. Then hit with the knuckles of your clenched fist straight for the point of the jaw.

"Not every one is frightened beyond reason. A swimmer may have a cramp and be unable to get ashore unassisted, but may keep his head. To aid him, swim a side stroke and let him lie on his side behind you, with his hand on your shoulder.

If you are helping a drowning but cool-headed person who cannot swim, caution him to keep his body, and even his head, low down in the water, and to let the arm resting on your shoulder be outstretched to its limit, for thus he will put the least extra weight on you and preserve your strength.

"If you reach a drowning person after he loses consciousness, or are obliged to use the 'knockout' blow, the best way to save him is to grasp him by the hair, and swim on your back. In this way you can keep his nose and mouth out of water, and stay afloat a long time.

These movements should be practised by those who bathe together just as a fire-drill is practised.

Moreover, the application of first relief to a person who has been under water for some time, ought to be practised. Frequently, a doctor cannot reach the scene until it is too late. We have all perhaps read what to do but we need to know what to do. Let me quote here the substance of what Dr. Batter says in his Emergency Notes :—

1. Turn the body on the stomach and raise the hips, pressing forcibly on each side of the spine at the back of the chest. This is to cause water to run out of the wind pipe. Do not use more than one minute for this.

2. Turn the person on the back with shoulders raised. With a handkerchief wrapped on fore finger wipe out the mouth. Pull the tongue out on the chin and have some one hold it there, or tie it in place with a handkerchief.

3. Kneel at the head, grasp arms below elbows, bring over head and make elbows touch the ground. Hold in this position three seconds.

4. Carry the arms back so that elbows rest on the chest, the hands coming up toward chin. Press with weight of your body on chest and ribs for three seconds.

These two movements imitate inspiration and expiration. Stop for a moment, occasionally, to see whether change of colour, gasping, or movements of the stomach indicate that natural breathing is beginning. When this begins, slap chest with a towel, wet with cold water; or, better, pour on cold and hot water alternately. Apply smelling salts or ammonia to the nose. Continue for at least two hours.

In the meantime get off all clothing and keep the body warm in any way possible. Have some spirits ready to give the patient as soon as he can swallow.

If young people were taught the first movements at the same time that they are taught to swim, it would indeed be a happy thing; and it seems to be the duty of those who teach swimming to, at the same time, hand down these simple elementary facts. It would be of interest to know what the many swimming schools throughout the country are teaching; and I believe you will do a public service by calling the attention of those in the foreign community, who are teaching swimming this summer, to this matter.

I am sir, yours etc.,

A SWIMMER.

He said that he hoped for the best, and when asked, "Is it not a fact that nothing can be done to protect British trade with Japan except to politely ask for a reduction of the duties?" Sir E. Grey hoped that the anticipations were premature and said it was better to wait until negotiations with certain other Powers are over. IMPERIAL DEFENCE.

PETITION FOR £100,000,000 LOAN.

The following memorial has been addressed "To the Right Honourable The Prime Minister, 10, Downing-street, S.W." in favour of a hundred million loan for National Defence:—

SIR,—It is an axiom to which we believe that you would readily assent that National Defence, and most especially the question of our naval strength, should be above politics and above party. Yet the governing condition of National Defence is finance, and under our present party system this fact necessarily brings Defence into the domain of political controversy.

But in recollection of the momentary truce lately imposed upon all such strife by our recent great national loss, we venture now to appeal to you to adopt a proposal which, if carried into effect, would go far to lift National Defence above the arena of party by removing from that arena, to a large extent, the vexed question of financial provision.

We make public appeal to you, therefore, as the Head of his Majesty's Government, to obtain sanction during the present Parliamentary Session to a Loan of one hundred million pounds for National Defence.

The sum named, if wisely expended, would be a final warning to potential antagonists that Great Britain declines to be outdone in the struggle for National and Imperial Independence. It is, moreover, of historic interest to the Liberal Party, inasmuch as it is the exact figure chosen by Mr. Cobden himself (in his wellknown Rochdale speech of June, 1861) to represent what he was prepared to spend on the British Navy alone "rather than allow the French Navy to be increased to a level with ours, because," as he then stated, "I should say that any attempt of that sort, without any legitimate grounds, would argue some sinister design upon this country."

We do not inquire here whether any of the great nations does now in fact harbour sinister designs against Great Britain. But we lay stress on the fundamental point that the approximation by any other country to our own maritime strength would be in the long run equally fatal to us, whether "sinister design" existed or not.

For conflict of interests between world-wide Empires is of frequent occurrence without malignity of intention, and war with any naval power nearly as great as our own would entail such danger and suffering to our population as would preclude any British Ministry from voluntarily engaging in it. But in that case any menaced British interests would be consistently sacrificed; and Great Britain, with her daughter-nations, would thus be forced, soon and inevitably, into the position of a subordinate State, taking its orders from the rival Empire which it feared to fight.

Thus the binding need of maintaining British Naval Supremacy and of rendering the British Empire efficient for war, is independent altogether of the question of the present nature of the design of any rival Power.

We are convinced that, in raising the Loan proposed, his Majesty's Government would receive the whole-hearted support of his Majesty's Opposition, who would gladly associate themselves with a scheme designed to secure safety to the Nation and to the Empire. We would point out further that as the Loan would form part of the Nation's Debt, and as its repayment would necessarily be spread over a considerable period of time, both parties would be equally responsible for its burden during the years when each, respectively, was in office.

We are convinced that, responsibility for the repayment being thus divided, your initiation of such a Loan would receive the support of an overwhelming majority of the Nation at large, irrespectively altogether of party ties.

For, external security is the evident condition of internal development.

In the earnest hope of your acceptance of the proposal which we thus submit, we would venture respectfully to put before you a further suggestion, namely, to appoint a Committee of Naval and Military Officers to co-operate with the Naval and Military Officers of the Board of Admiralty and the Army Council, in formulating a scheme (in which the Navy, Army, and Aviation should alike be included) for spending to the best national advantage the entirety of this Loan. By these means, three important ends would be served:—(1) The inclusion of officers outside official ranks would assure the Nation that the Committee would be free from any political pressure, the exercise of which might otherwise, however unreasonably, be alleged. Moreover, the collaboration, in a combined scheme of National Defence, of such men as, e.g., Admiral of the Fleet Sir A. K. Wilson, and Field-Marshal Lord Kitchener, would of itself go far to inspire and to restore public confidence. (2) Proof would thus be given of the non-party character of the Committee. (3) Expert authority would have fair play, and as the total amount of expenditure would have been fixed previously, no risk of extra cost would be thereby incurred.

With reference to the necessity for the Loan proposed, we do not intend here to offer you detailed evidence, since that necessity was admitted, either implicitly or explicitly, in March, 1909, in the House of Commons, both by yourself and by other members of his Majesty's Government. We need only refer, by way of instance, to the intimation of Sir Edward Grey, that the rapid progress of a Continental Navy imposed on us the duty of rebuilding the whole of our Fleet, upon the penalty, if that duty were neglected, of becoming the "Conscript Appanage of some Stronger Power."

The inadequacy of our military strength to the needs of the Empire has formed the subject to frequent and solemn warning from many authorities, including one so high as Field-Marshal Lord Roberts.

The necessity also of putting Great Britain on a level with any other country in regard to the provision of an aerial fleet is now recognised by all thinking men.

On these heads we only desire to record our conviction that national danger does threaten, and that the need of special effort to meet it is urgent.

We would, however, observe that, whether this opinion be correct or otherwise, the existence of a wide-spread apprehension of peril is a fact beyond dispute, and one which is an operative cause in driving British Capital, the wage-fund of our people, beyond the seas. To allay this anxiety is therefore an object of statesmanship which would by itself justify the means suggested.

We are aware that Loans for National Defence may be held in ordinary times to be bad finance. But the present need is not ordinary, and as "Defence is greater than Opulence," so is the restoration of national confidence by the assurance of national safety a higher end than financial correctness.

We appeal to you, as British citizens to the Head of their country's Government, to grant our present prayer, and thus earn the lasting gratitude of the British Empire.

The memorial is signed by a number of admirals and generals, distinguished in the naval and military services.

AMERICAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS FILIPINOS.

"UNLOVELY AND PAGAN RACE-PREJUDICE."

Until the American lays aside his "small, unlovely and essentially pagan-race-prejudice;" until he learns to regard Orientals "as members of the same great human family of God's children;" until he recognizes and respects the decent self-respect of a proud and sensitive people, he must be in danger of failing in his great purpose "to act the part of 'Big Brother' to the Filipino, and help him to stand on his own feet and become an independent people with a democratic government of his own." Writing thus from his missionary station at Jaro, Philippine Islands, Rev. Charles W. Briggs declares, in an article published in a recent number of the Baptist monthly, Missions, New York, that, because of America's repeated evidences of kindness and unselfishness, no other foreign nation is so well loved or has so great an influence in Japan, Korea, and China. And yet,

"No other people is so imbued with a small, despicable, unchristian race-prejudice as are the Americans. Where the Englishman looks upon the Oriental as an inferior and childish branch of the human family, and the Frenchman and German and Dutchman look upon the Oriental as a weaker people whom it will be comparatively easy to exploit and turn into perennial fountains of revenue, the American in the Orient has more the air of being sole representative of the human race, and the Oriental is classed as a subhuman species that may eventually develop, through long periods of progressive development, into the genus homo "It is hard to think of anything more unlovely, more contrary to the spirit of Jesus, and more fatal to every fair prospect and promise of a great world movement of regeneration."

Mr. Briggs gives the American nation full credit for its unselfish efforts during the last twelve years toward "delivering the Filipino people from a past that was without hope." To day, we learn, "Filipino hearts thrill with a splendid hope, and the best of them are making almost superhuman efforts to avail themselves of the opportunities of the hour." But in the glow of their enthusiasm they are chilled by the racial antipathy shown toward them by nearly every American they meet.

It is possible, says Mr. Briggs, that it is not even now too late to rectify our great mistake.

"The Filipino would almost forgive the past if he had assurance that the future was to give him the treatment he craves from Americans. He does not crave political independence, but he unflinchingly demands his self-respect and will never yield it to our antipathy. This makes him worth while."

THE earth has now entered one of the most famous meteoric streams of the year, writes a Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society. Beginning at about the middle of July meteors become increasingly numerous until August 12 and then decrease until about a week later, when no more Perseids are to be seen. The members of this particular stream are termed Perseids from the fact that they shoot from the direction of the constellation Perseus, situated in the evenings in the north-east sky. If the meteoric shower attains its average strength this year it is probable that quite sixty or seventy millions of its fragments will be consumed in our atmosphere. This is approximately the number destroyed every year, and yet there is no perceptible diminution of the display.

ACCORDING to the latest investigation of the Railway Board into the present state of the railways of various Powers, the United States stands first on the list in its mileage and income, reaching 200,200 miles aggregate, while Russia comes next with its 38,000 miles. It is equally worthy of notice that English railways which come seventh in the list of mileage, stand next to those of the United States in their income, and that Japan, having more mileage than Belgium, has less income than the latter country. A NEW HEAVY GUN of 14.3-inch calibre has been invented by Messrs. Armstrong, Whitworth, and Co., Ltd., of Elswick, which promises to revolutionise gunnery both in the Army and Navy. It is understood that the leading feature of the new weapon is the replacement of recoil springs by chambers containing a patent liquid and air. These new recoil cylinders are understood to have been such a success that it has been demonstrated that it is possible for the gun, once laid, to remain in the same position for ten consecutive shots. The increase in steadiness and accuracy of shooting is remarkable, as is shown by the statement that of ten shots fired five passed practically through the same hole in the target, a feat hitherto unknown in the annals of gunnery. The gun is to be submitted to the War Office in a few days, and will probably be mounted on future Dreadnoughts.

ONOYAMA KIOSUKE, who murdered a share-broker's boy at the Ogome Hotel in Tosabori, Osaka, a short time ago and stole from him a large sum of money, was sentenced to death on the 25th ultimo in the Osaka Chihō Saibansho. The time for an appeal, says the Kobe Herald, expired yesterday. His relatives instructed Mr. S. Kishimoto, the Osaka lawyer, to appeal against the judgment. Mr. Kishimoto accordingly had an interview with Onoyama yesterday in the Osaka prison and recommended him to appeal. The prisoner, however, strongly opposed the idea, stating that it was his desire to obediently undergo punishment and that it would be an injustice to the public to attempt to mitigate his crime. He remained entirely unmoved by the representations and in the end the proposed appeal had to be given up.

REALLY TERRIBLE SKIN TROUBLES

Girl's Head a Mass of Humour—Grew Thin and Weak—Despaired of Ever Curing Her—Baby was Even Worse with Running Eczema—No Signs of Eruption Left Now.

MOTHER TELLS HOW CUTICURA CURED BOTH

"My little girl's head started with a lot of pimples and then they began to fill with matter and discharge. As fast as one broke there was a lot more came out until her head was a complete mass of running sores. For days she would not take any notice of us. She began to get thin and weak and I gave up all hope of ever getting her head well again until I saw about the Cuticura Remedies. But Cuticura made it quite well again (it was bad for about six months). Her hair is getting lovely and thick now."

"Cuticura cured my baby's face at the same time. His dear little nose and chin were raw with this same complaint and used to run and bleed awfully. When I have carried him down from his sleep his pillow would be covered with blood. One day my neighbour carried him down and she screamed to see him covered with blood where the places had been running. But now he is entirely free from anything and is such a lovely fat boy. His nose was nearly eaten away with it. I was told by people in the village that it was the running eczema. I tried endless ointments but none did it any good till I received the Cuticura and I am glad to say that it has cured both of them. Mrs. L. Brown, Manor Cottages, Stanwick, nr. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, Eng., Nov. 12, 1909."

Cuticura is the most economical treatment known for the skin, scalp, hair and hands, of infants, children and adults. YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, AUG. 13TH, 1910.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

NINE iron bridges are to be built on the Amur railway line, the estimated cost being 5,042,300 roubles.

A NEW issue of five yen notes is now ready for distribution at the Government Printing Bureau, and will be issued after the first of next month, in exchange for old ones.

A HONGKONG telegram says that foreign journals there commenting on the rumoured secret understanding between Japan and Russia, declare it to be an impossibility.

AN Asahi telegram says that a Japanese medicine-vender was discovered several days ago murdered in a mountain near Fushun. Five Chinese suspects have been arrested.

IN connection with the final adoption of Postal Savings Banks in the United States, it is interesting to note that a considerable effort has been made in this country recently to promote savings among the people, through these Banks, the result being some 30,000,000 yen addition to previous records. This is an excellent showing and one which it is hoped will continue.

PRINCE HUSHIMI, Sr., who left Tokyo on the 3rd inst. for Kyoto to attend a meeting of the Butoku-Kwai, arrived there on the 4th inst. and entered the villa at Kawaramachi.

ON the 4th instant the Department of Education instructed all the prefectural governments to be careful in preventing the public from perusing magazines and other works of socialistic tendencies.

THE Modern History of Korea will henceforth be studied in the literature department of the Tokyo Imperial University. Bungaku-Hakushi Shidehara will be appointed as Professor in charge of this branch.

IT has been announced that the International Meteorological Conference will be held at Berlin next summer. Dr. Nakamura, Chief of the Central Meteorological Observatory, will be sent to attend the conference.

THE railways in Korea which were placed, not long ago, under the control of the Railway Board, are now reported to be again transferred to the hands of the Resident-General, or, more properly, of the Governor-General of Korea, after the annexation.

A JUDGE and a procurator of the Tokyo Court of Appeals visited Kumamoto a few days ago, and, as a consequence, six persons, described as socialists, were arrested. Domiciliary searches were made of eight houses and it is possible that further arrests will be made.

THE gold mine at Ishizuchi, Ehime prefecture, which was recently discovered by Mr. Tezuka Kisaburo of Nagasaki, is now reported to be one of the richest finds in Japan. The assay of ore has turned out as high a percentage as 6/100,000 or even 7/100,000.

A PEKING telegram says that British, German, French, and United States financial representatives have been vigorously pressing the Wai wu-pu to carry out the provisional loan agreement signed by the late Chang Chih-tung for the Canton-Hankow-Szechuan railways.

A NAGASAKI trader who has returned from Australia is quoted as saying that the market in Australia has shown some activity owing to the good harvest of wheat and the recovery of the market price of coal. Flour is being largely exported to Manila and Hongkong.

MR. UYEMURA SHUMPEI, who has been relieved by his own request of the post of Chief of the Kyushu Railway Administration Office, assumed the office of Mayor of Osaka on Monday. Mr. Fujita Koriki of the Railway Board has been appointed the successor of Mr. Uyemura.

As it seems that the question of fitting up wireless telegraphic apparatus in ocean navigation steamers will be brought forward at the International Wireless Telegraph Conference to be held in London next year, it is reported that the Government will send a representative to attend the Conference.

IN the interval between April 1st and July 15th, the Railway Relief Guild has extended relief to 5,483 men, with a total expense of yen 138,746 42, itemized as follows:—179 men have been injured, and the amount paid is yen 42,275; 171 have died, the amount paid being yen 34,682.82; medical aid has been extended to 2,888 at a cost of yen 39,845.67, of which number 2,245 have repaid in the sum of yen 12,488.86. The expense for hospitals amounted to yen 1,008.01. Other petty expenses make up the total as above.

ACCORDING to the official statistics of the United States, the import of foreign manufactured articles during the year ending March, 1910, amounted to $730,000,000, which shows an increase of 16 per cent. as compared with the preceding year. It is stated that the amount will exceed $900,000,000 in this fiscal year.

AN authentic report from the United States says that some Japanese tea recently imported to the United States was found to have been mixed with mulberry-leaves in order to make it froth much better when stirred. Strict inspection is necessary before tea is exported from Japan, to prevent such injurious practices.

IT is interesting to note the discussions of an Elevated Railway for Tokyo. It seems very likely that this road will be allowed, as a special committee of four members has now been appointed to discuss conditions for a charter. These roads are so clumsy and dirty, and fearfully noisy that it is matter of regret to think of their being allowed in the Metropolis.

ON the 4th instant a passenger train coming from Kofu came to a standstill after entering the Ohikage Tunnel, something having gone wrong with the engine. After making temporary repairs the train moved on, but when it reached the middle of another tunnel on the line, it again stopped. Subsequently the train was made to run back to Shioyama Station, taking advantage of the sharp grade.

BARON VON MUMM, the German Ambassador in Tokyo, is now home on leave of absence and it was stated some time ago that His Excellency would be transferred to the Ambassadorship in a certain other country. It is, however, reported that in view of the proposed visit of the German Crown Prince to Japan, the Baron has been ordered to remain in the present office until April next year, and that he will return to Tokyo shortly in order to make preparations for the reception of the Prince Imperial.

A MUKDEN telegram says that, owing to a wide divergence of opinion, the delimitation of the Fushun colliery is deferred. The taxation question was recently being discussed, but the negotiations were once more suspended, this time for six days from August 8th. The Chinese delegate proposes the withdrawal of the Japanese police from Fushun, but the Japanese representative will not entertain such a proposal, as the present negotiations are to settle matters concerning the delimitation, taxation, etc., according to the Manchurian Convention of 1909.

THE Foreign Land Ownership Bill, says the Yorozu, which was promulgated some time ago, prohibited foreigners to possess land in Hokkaido, Formosa, and Saghalien. After the annexation of Korea, it may naturally be thought that alien possession of land will be prohibited in the peninsula as well as in the above-mentioned colonies. In due respect to the history of Korea, however, the authorities will not absolutely prohibit the foreign possession of land in that country, and those who are at present holding land there will be allowed to enjoy the same privilege—a privilege which, we presume, will by no means be of a permanent nature.

CHINA.

It appears that systematic opposition is being organized to the project of the Tetsurei-Kailiang railway, on the part of the Chinese merchants at the rival centre of Kaigen. Some days ago, when the Viceroy of Manchuria ordered a survey of the above line to be made and estimates drawn up of the cost of construction, a counter-scheme was put forward by the Kaigen merchants, and a representative deputation from that city is now in Mukden with the object of pushing their own project at the expense of the Viceroy's. The grounds of opposition appear to be based on a claim of superior advantages for a Kailiang-Kaigen railway. The distance between these two places is 360 Chinese li—while that between Kailiang and Tetsurei is computed at 340; but the country to be traversed in the former case is level and clear, while in the latter it is beset with numerous rivers and other impediments. Consequently, while the cost of constructing a railway from Kailiang to Kaigen would be (say the merchants) some four million taels, the Tetsurei-Kailiang project could not be carried through for double that amount, and would take a much longer period for completion.

In view of the hardships now being suffered by the people of Shantung owing, in large measure, to the prohibition of the export of cereals from Manchuria, the Governor of the afflicted province has petitioned the Viceroy of Manchuria for a remission of the prohibition. In reply the Viceroy pointed out that although similar distress existed in so near a region as the Amur province, as the result of famine and a series of inundations, he could not see his way to grant any release at present. It was hoped, however, that, in six months' time, the export of cereals would be permitted from Yingkow and Antung to Shantung, and the Taotai's of those ports have been instructed accordingly.

The news is confirmed that Prince Tsai-Chun's projected visit to the United States of America and Japan is for the purpose of making investigations preliminary to providing China with a Navy. The Prince is to leave Peking on the 19th inst. and proceed to Shanghai, whence he will travel direct to the United States, and after spending full 18 days there, will set out for Japan, so that he may be expected to reach this country about the middle of October. It is alleged that the programme of naval increment contemplated by China extends over 5 years, and that her fleet will then consist of 8 first-class armoured cruisers; 20 second-class cruisers; 10 gun-boats, and three torpedo squadrons. The cost of this group of ships is estimated at 1,800,000 yen, but this figure is obviously a mistake for 180 millions. Nothing is said as to the source from which funds are to be obtained, and until that point is definitely cleared up very little faith will be attached to the realization of the scheme. It is stated that at present the number of ships constituting the Chinese navy is 68, with a total displacement of 66,250 tons. But among the whole number there is only one vessel that can be reckoned serviceable, namely the Haihsi, a cruiser of 4,300 tons with a speed of 24 knots.

In common with several other places in China, Shantung is suffering so much from lack of food stuffs that the governor has applied to the Viceroy of Mukden to remove all restrictions on the export of grain. But Manchuria itself is scarcely in a condition to minister to the want of other places, its own resources being exceptionally limited this year. He promised to do what he can for the relief of the Shantung sufferers, but he points out that not alone are the crops inferior in Central Manchuria, but also that, in the Amur region, something like a famine threatens. Altogether, it would seem that 1910 is to be a disastrous season for China.

We stated in a recent issue that, after long delays a conference was at last about to meet for the purpose of finally discussing the claims set up by certain Russian subjects to private property in various parts of Manchuria; that is to say, to property lawfully acquired during the time when Russia occupied the Three Eastern Provinces. It is now stated that the place of conference is to be Mukden, and that the principal properties in question are baths put up by Russian subjects at the hot springs of Hseungyo-cheng, and various buildings erected at Liaoyang. We hear for the first time of the above-mentioned hot springs, the name Hseungyo-cheng having hitherto been associated chiefly with the fishery dispute between Japan and China. But as for Liaoyang, it is well known that Russian enterprise was very busy there prior to the outbreak of war.

The Yomiuri Shimbun has an interesting article urging the advisability of increased Japanese enterprise in the Yantsze valley and in southern China. Our contemporary contends that a field just as profitable as Manchuria offers in these regions. It is true that there has been considerable expansion of late years, but the Yomiuri does not consider it really sufficient. It gives a table, unfortunately vague, which shows the actual increase in the case of Shanghai-kwan, but contains no detailed information as to other places. The table is as follows:—

	1901.	At present.
Shanghai	1,374	7,500
Hakow	72	1,500
Suchow	28
Hanchow	35	unknown.
Nanking	15
Sashi	14

It is difficult to choose confidently between the perplexing reports circulated from time to time about the Chinese Navy. The original story was that an order had been placed in Germany for one vessel and in France for another, while, in the U.S. of America, a third was expected to be built. This statement was subsequently modified in the sense that Germany and England were the countries chosen; and, thereafter, the public was informed that America had been added to the list. But we have now two very positive telegrams from Shanghai to the effect that one cruiser has been ordered from Messrs. Vickers and Maxim; that Messrs. Armstrong and Vickers have been commissioned to construct a second on the same lines, and that there is a strong probability of a third being built in America. We do not pretend to make a selection between these stories, but we should deem it very strange if English builders were entirely unsuccessful in such a competition.

Thus far, the course of events in China seems to promise well for the success of parliamentary institutions. The local assemblies have shown considerable competence—much more competence, indeed, than there was any just ground to anticipate. This satisfactory record is now supplemented by a similar account of the proceedings of the Tzuchengyuan, which, as our readers know, may be regarded as the immediate predecessor of the Chinese Diet. It holds meetings three times a month, on the 5th, the 15th and the 25th, and its personnel consists of members specially selected by local assemblies, and of high officials from Princes downwards. Telegrams from Peking announce that a spirit of marked good-will and coöperation distinguishes these meetings, and that, as an earnest of the parliamentary institution, nothing could be more promising.

The Asahi quotes a traveller who has just returned from Mukden as saying that the progress of the Kilin-Changchun line is conspicuously slow. Up to the present time the construction operations have been limited to earth-work over a distance of 30 miles, and even that is not completed. It is thought that the road will not be opened to traffic before the year after next. The navvies employed are solely Chinese, and the consequence is that the rate of progress resembles the gait of an ox. One operation, namely the boring of a tunnel at Tszu-nen, has not yet been commenced, and will require fully two years to achieve. Meanwhile, the line is to make a detour through a distance of 2,000 yards. There are also two rivers to be negotiated, but they do not present any special difficulties.

The Government has made another concession to Russia. A short time ago, the public learned that a dispute had arisen between the two Empires as to the location of the frontier at Manjuri. The views of the disputants showed considerable divergence, and it was not thought that a settlement could easily be effected. But China has shown herself unwilling to make trouble about such a question, and has agreed that the station at Manjuri shall be regarded as the frontier. This means that the boundary of the Russian Empire is pushed southward 15 versts and that two-thirds of the town of Manjuri become Russian territory.

Reports from Manchuria show that the bandits are particularly active. Their favourite objects of attack are the offices of the contractors of the Mukden-Antung line, and there have been several casualties in those districts of late. Both Chinese and Japanese police are strenuously coöperating to control this lawlessness, but as the millet crop is now in full growth and is exceptionally luxuriant on account of heavy rain prevailing throughout Manchuria, the bandits can find cover everywhere, and are proportionately hard to deal with.

It appears that the editors of the Chinese newspapers of Manchuria, namely, those published in Mukden, Yingkow, Changchun Kilin and Harbin, have held a meeting in Mukden and formed a league, for the ostensible purpose of adopting a uniform attitude towards the questions of the day. But the real motive of this move is believed to be found in the recent Russo-Japanese Convention. The Chinese have always been noted for their power of combination, not as a nation, but as groups. This method of utilizing the press, by combining a number of journals for the purposes of a special propaganda, might prove very efficacious. There is no lack of evidence as to the nature of the propaganda. It has been clearly shown by recent articles in two or three Mukden journals which describe the Convention as the tocsin of the Chinese Empire's doom.

News from Manchuria says that the crops to the north of Mukden this year will be only 80 per cent. of the average yield, and that the crops to the south of that town will be still worse. In Japan, also, apprehensions for the rice-crop begin to be entertained. The doyo season came to an end on the 8th inst. and did not produce more than two or three days of the great heat generally experienced in that period. It is therefore feared that even though the weather should now improve, the injury hitherto wrought will be found irreparable.

Rumours about the resuscitation of the Chinese navy continue to be busily circulated. It is now alleged that four river gun-boats have been ordered from the Vulcan and Krupp Cos. at a cost of 750,000 dollars each, and that Messrs. Vickers & Maxim have received a commission to construct a 2,400-ton cruiser, sister ship to one ordered from Messrs. Armstrong, Whitworth & Co. No orders have actually been given to Japanese yards, but the Mitsubishi and the Kawasaki have been invited to prepare estimates for gun-boats of 500 tons. As to the source of funds for these purposes, a percentage of the late Empress Dowager's fortune is again spoken of, but only as a conjecture.

When the renowned Mr. Wu Ting-fang returned from representing his country in Washington, he strongly urged the advisability of docking the Chinese queue and dressing the hair of men in western style. His proposal, however, met with much opposition, some condemning it on purely conservative grounds, and others querying the wisdom of placing appearances before essentials. There the matter rested. But it is said to have been revived by Prince Tsai-Tao, who recently returned from a tour in the Occident. His representations have influenced the Prince Regent, so that there seems to be really a chance of this most irrational kind of coiffure being abolished. We can understand the Manchus approving the custom, inasmuch as it is a badge of the servitude imposed by them upon the vanquished Chinese; but why the latter should show any conservatism it is hard to see.

THE NEW CHINESE REPRESENTATIVE.

It is always the custom of diplomatists to speak in sympathetic tones of the relations between their own country and the State to which they are accredited. Too much value, therefore, cannot be attached to the very friendly utterances of the new Chinese Minister at the Japanese Court. But there appears to be a genuine note of friendship in Mr. Wang's allusions to Japan, and he is certainly right in saying that no grave questions now threaten to disturb the relations between this country and its western neighbour. For the moment, at all events, the atmosphere is quite clear. Mr. Wang is quoted as speaking with keen interest of the events that may be anticipated in connexion with the practical preliminaries of a national assembly at the close of this year in China. Certainly, that event will be watched with much attention by the whole world, for immense issues depend upon China's regeneration. We may add that Mr. Wang spent a considerable time in Tokyo some years ago in the capacity of superintendent of Chinese students in that city.

Mr. Wang has undergone what may be called the usual suburban ordeal of interviewing. It has now become quite an established custom for the leading newspapers of the capital to despatch reporters to Shizuoka or Nagoya, whence they become the travelling companions of any distinguished personages en route for the capital. Mr. Wang has had this experience, but it cannot be said that any particular interesting information has been obtained from him by the interviewers. He spoke of the fact that he himself had already made Japan's intimate acquaintance; he expressed a hope that if he proved equal to his office, he would remain a long time in Tokyo; and he spoke of the relations between Japan and China as most satisfactory, only a few minor problems remaining for solution in Manchuria. He also stated very emphatically that he favoured interchanges of hospitality in the form of visits by parties of business-men or journalists. But he seemed to think that no organization suitable for such a programme existed as yet in China, either among men of affairs or among representatives of the press. After the conclusion of the Nanking Exhibition, however, a party will probably be formed by the persons engaged in that enterprise, and with regard to the journalists, the efforts of Mr. Lay of the Peking and Tientsin Times seem likely to succeed in effecting coöperation among pressmen.

Referring to the subject of Chinese students in Japan and to the fact of their recent numerical diminution, Mr. Wang said that they had not fallen off in number owing to any preference for other countries as an educational field. The truth was that there had been a total lack of discrimination in selecting these students originally. They had been sent without reference to their qualifications, and the results had been proportionately unsatisfactory. Care was thereafter taken to choose only well-prepared material, and if the number of students was reduced in consequence, it might fairly be hoped that the results would be proportionately satisfactory. Already, many Chinese students educated in Japan were holding important positions in their own country.

It will be remembered that two of the sons of the late Viceroy Chang accompany the new Chinese Minister to Tokyo. Mr. Haraguchi, technical adviser to the Department of Posts and Telegraphs in Peking, explains that the elder of these two visitors is 32 years of age, and is the ninth of Chang's sons. He comes to Tokyo to act as superintendent of Chinese students in Japan, and he enjoys in his own country the reputation of being almost as learned a man as his illustrious father. The second of the Viceroy's sons who comes with Mr. Wang's suite is 22 years of age, and his purpose is to enter the Imperial University.

Prof. Haraguchi speaks also in the highest terms of the scholastic attainments and absolute integrity of the new Chinese Representative. He says that Mr. Wang enjoyed the unceasing patronage of the late Viceroy Chang, and that his reputation for learning stands high among his own countrymen.

With reference to the Yangtze Valley railways, the Professor is quoted as saying that nothing has yet been settled as to the employment of foreign capital. The Chinese Authorities are naturally anxious to have the line built with domestic money, if that be possible. Turning to the recent dismissal of a number of Japanese experts who had been employed on the survey of the roads, Mr. Haraguchi declares that no anti-Japanese feeling whatever was responsible for this action. The simple explanation is that the old system of dealing with the lines having been altered, no opportunity existed of continuing the service of these experts; but he evidently believes that some of them, at any rate, will be reëngaged when the new system is elaborated.

JAPANESE EMIGRATION TO MANCHURIA.

Judging from such evidences of Japanese policy as are perceptible to the general public, and from statements made by responsible ministers to Committees of the Diet, there can be no doubt of the present Cabinet's desire to divert the stream of emigration from the American Continent to the East Asian. Even without Government assistance and incentive, this change began to be effected after the war. Of course, there are some opponents of such a policy. Their opposition has found expression, from time to time, in the columns of the Tokyo press, and it is said that Mr. Shirani of the Governor-General's Office in Kwantung, has added his voice to the criticism. He points out that in Kwantung, at all events, the valuable districts are already fully settled and labour is both abundant and cheap. But to this the supporters of the Government's policy reply that agricultural operations and farm labour are not the only fields for profitable immigration. They point, for example, to Mukden where there were absolutely no Japanese residents prior to 1904, and where there are now 4,000. Moreover, the whole of Manchuria itself is a case very much in point, for within the last six years the Japanese residing there for business purposes have grown from cipher to tens of thousands. Thus, everything indicates the wisdom of encouraging emigration in the direction of Manchuria, and the Governor-General of Kwantung has decided to send a commissioner to Europe and America for the purpose of investigating the general question of colonization. Mr. Takahashi Motoji has been appointed for the purpose and will set out on the 20th inst.

THE SUNGALI PROBLEM.

It is pointed out with much justice that although the Sungali River has been nominally thrown open to all the flags of the world, the privilege has little practical value, unless similar liberty is allowed in the case of the Amur and the Ussuri. At the same time no doubt appears to be entertained that Russia will take the necessary steps to give reality to the new arrangement. Japanese newspapers welcome the understanding recently arrived at in the matter of the Sungali, and point to it as a genuine example of the principle of the Open Door. The Aigun Treaty of 1858 and Ili Treaty of 1881 conferred on Russia privileges of an exclusive nature which she might have asserted in defiance of the Open Door policy now professed by so many great states. But she has made no attempt whatever to secure for herself any monopoly of riverine facilities in the Three Eastern Provinces, and if the world wants any proof of her frank adherence to the policy of the Open Door, that proof is here furnished.

KOREA.

Reports from Seoul indicate that a state of unwonted activity prevails at the Ministry of Agriculture and that there have been frequent comings and goings between the Department of Police and the Residency-General. This alleged industry on the part of officialdom is said to have attracted public attention, but as the Korean capital is all agog for sensation of any kind, it is more than possible that the various newspaper correspondents have become infected with the same spirit and have read all sorts of significance into the most ordinary movements of officials.

An extraordinary Council of Ministers was held, says the Jiji Shimpō, at 10 a.m. on the 4th inst., at the private residence of the Resident-General. The Vice-Resident-General, as well as General Terauchi himself, were present at the meeting, which lasted two hours. It is perhaps hardly necessary to remark that, though the proceedings were conducted in camera, the popular belief is that matters of the highest importance were discussed.

Discussing the question of amalgamation, the Asahi gives it as its opinion that all Korea's treaties with Foreign Powers will certainly be cancelled. On the other hand, so long as the Powers interested in the development of the Peninsula lose none of the privileges they have hitherto enjoyed in the matter of equality of opportunity and the open door, they will raise no objection to the proposed amalgamation. In the case of the agreement of 1908 between Japan and the United States with respect to new inventions, trade marks, and copyrights, America stands to lose nothing by the impending change, as the agreement will be made to apply to Korea as it now does to this country.

Two Korean papers, the Chosen Nippon and the Nikkan Dempo, have been ordered to suspend publication because of having commented on the present situation in a manner detrimental to the public interest.

Two Japanese newspapers, or one newspaper and a news-agency, have been suspended for offences described as very trivial, and it is inferred that the press laws are to be enforced with great vigour under the present regime. We shall not be at all surprised if events justify this inference.

The Japanese military authorities have no special affection for newspapers. The archives of the military and naval departments in Tokyo contain matter which is not calculated to inspire any feelings of special amiability towards the press, and if it be true that an international drama of the gravest importance is about to be enacted in Seoul, we shall not be at all surprised to find the newspapers subjected to treatment similar to that which prevailed during the war with Russia.

The building of the Pyongyang-Chemulpo Railway is said to be progressing rapidly. Out of the total length of 34 miles, some 17 on the Pyongyang side, have been finished, and it is expected that the whole road will be open to traffic about November next.

Rumour continues to be busy with the Korean Premier, Mr. Yi. It is persistently alleged that he does not wish to go down in the page of history as leader of the Cabinet which acquiesced in the annexation of Korea to Japan. He is quite content with the wealth he possesses, which is considerable, and with the rank he has obtained, which is as high as anything he can hope for. Thus, his ambition being satisfied, he can afford to think of his reputation solely. On the other hand he owes too much to Japan to take any step that would embarrass her at this juncture. He is consequently represented as privately endeavouring to bring about the resignation of some of his colleagues, without whose coöperation he might simulate inability to remain in office.

Conjectures are still rife about the methods to be pursued in the incorporation of Korea into the Japanese Empire. Our readers must have already observed that the question of annexation itself no longer invites any discussion the whole attention of the public being devoted to the methods of procedure. It appears to be generally agreed that no drastic changes will be made in the realm of customs duties. Things will be left, for the present at all events, in statu quo, only such precautions being adopted as are absolutely necessary to provide a working basis. As to the Residency-General, the idea is that it will be abolished, and he replaced by a Governor-General's Office, similar to that existing in Kwantung and Formosa. We observe a marked disinclination to discuss the future of the Imperial Household. All the critics seem disposed to shirk that question.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun, quoting an anonymous high official, denies that any necessity exists for consulting the Diet by way of preliminary to the annexation of Korea. Some of the Seiyū-kai politicians are understood to insist that the Government is bound to take counsel with the Diet beforehand, but that view over-estimates the importance of the problem. It will be quite correct if the Government proceeds by the route of urgency ordinance and post-facto Parliamentary approval.

With regard to the conditions under which annexation will be effected, the Jiji Shimpō has a telegram from Seoul which professes to embody an absolutely trustworthy statement. Simultaneously with annexation, the treaties between Korea and the foreign Powers—according to this authority—will de facto lose validity and Japan will address formal notices to the various Powers in that sense. This, however, will not affect the rights hitherto acquired by foreign citizens or subjects in the Peninsula. Such rights will be held inviolable. As for consular jurisdiction, its abolition will be effected without delay. In any circumstances, preparation for that end have been in progress in Korea during several years, and the world now knows that a suitable code of laws and a competent judiciary exist in Korea. There is, consequently, no valid reason for the continuance of consular jurisdiction. This becomes specially true when we observe that the number of foreigners residing in Korea, exclusive of the Chinese, is only 700 and that the law cases in which they were concerned did not exceed 43.

With regard to customs dues, there is no idea of extending Japan's new tariff to her neighbour. That would be too drastic a course. What will be done is to maintain the system now existing and to supplement it by transit dues or consumption taxes, such as shall meet the situation.

It appears that there is an agitation in Seoul for the purpose of obtaining high promotion for certain Court officials and former members of the Cabinet. What object underlies this movement the telegram does not state, but the obvious inference is that influential personages are preparing for themselves a position which will constitute a title to special treatment at the time of annexation.

The original leader of the Il Ching-hoi, Mr. Sun Pyongchin, left Tokyo on the 6th inst. for Korea. Some special interest seems to be attached to his movements at this juncture.

The Authorities in the Korean capital are showing that they are at least impartial in the enforcement of the press laws. On the 6th inst. sentence of suspension was pronounced against the Seoul Press, a journal generally notable for its staid and level-headed comments. The telegraph says nothing as to the reasons for this step.

There has been of late some talk to the effect that Korea does not offer any opportunities for large land-holders, and that only small settlers have any chance of success. Mr. Uchida, of the Colonial Office, denies the correctness of this verdict. He admits that it may be true in some cases; that is to say, in districts which have already been partially reclaimed. But he alleges that there are large regions now lying absolutely waste, and that the only hope of bringing these under cultivation is that they should be taken up by big capitalists. After irrigation facilities and means of communication as well as drainage have been supplied, the land can be parcelled out in small lots among household settlers. There is still plenty of room for this kind of enterprise. Mr. Uchida admits, however, that his Office has not yet made any close scrutiny into such matters: it has left them in the hands of the Oriental Colonizing Company, to whose province such matters directly belong.

It is reported that a number of foreigners are visiting Korea in the expectation of witnessing some stirring events there in the near future. These visitors come mainly from Shanghai, and are so numerous that the two hotels in Seoul are quite full. Among the visitors there are two journalists.

The Chuo repeats its statement that the proclamation announcing the annexation of Korea will be made in Tokyo.

Viscount Terauchi's admonition, given immediately after his arrival in Seoul, seems to have produced an excellent effect. What he told his nationals was, in effect, that they must be circumspect in their own conduct. That is to say, they must consider the reputation of their country in their dealings with Koreans. Prince Ito said the same thing in his time, and so did Viscount Sone; but in Viscount Terauchi's case the precept derives force from the circumstances amid which it is delivered. The Nichi Nichi's Seoul correspondent, while greatly eulogizing the Viscount's action in this matter, comments in somewhat critical terms on an alleged want of uniformity in the attitude of officialdom towards the press. Thus, the organ of the Tai-Han Hyop-hoi recently published an article which, in effect, amounted to an exhortation to resist amalgamation by every possible means. The writer pointed out that if a man pulls down his own house, or abets others in pulling it down, he cannot complain though he has subsequently to live in the open air. There may be faults to find with the Korean national edifice, but, after all, it has been the home of the people for centuries; and, if they consent to see it dismantled, they must take the consequences. Such an article was eminently calculated to incite the Koreans against Japan, but the Residency-General took no steps to suspend the newspaper. On the other hand, they have suspended four or five Japanese newspapers for much more trivial offences against the cause of law and order.

The same correspondent urges that before attacking the citadel, the outworks must be demolished. By the outworks he designates the Yangpan and the Christian converts. His idea is that the former are vitally interested in maintaining the present situation; and as for the latter, his view is that nine out of every ten are converts, not to Christianity, but to the political possibilities which they connect with the foreign faith. He does not say, however, what course should be adopted towards either of these factors, and for our own part we can see nothing more unwise than to meddle drastically with either, until actual events afford justification.

THE ANNEXATION.

Disquieting rumours are again current about the behaviour of Korean students towards the problem of annexation. One could sympathise with these youths if they resorted to violence with any reasonable hope of preventing, or even deterring, the event to which they object. But they are said to fully understand that their agitation must be barren of permanent results, and that the most they can accomplish is to impart a momentary aspect of evil to the procedure of Japan. Thus, they are said to have searched the history of Restoration days in Japan for inspiration and to have taken from it the leaf which shows the anti-Tokugawa ronin as cutting down foreigners and burning legations for the sake of embroiling the Yedo Authorities with western States. It will not be suprising, therefore, if news comes from Seoul that some outrage against foreign life or property has been committed. The students are also reported to favour the assassination of Korean and Japanese statesmen directly connected with annexation. The police are carefully watching, and sparing no pains to guard against untoward incidents, but the police are not omnipotent. Meanwhile, the Prime Minister is said to have transferred his whole property to the name of his elder brother. What that step can have to do with the political situation we do not clearly see, but it is spoken of in the context of annexation. The rumour that his Excellency intends to resign is, however, negated.

The press in Seoul is evidently being subjected to very close scrutiny. No less than four Japanese newspapers published in that city have been suspended within the past few days, and the censorship of Korean journals is more particular than ever. The hand of the military is traceable here. We ventured, in a recent issue, to predict something of the kind; and we certainly think that if free speech can ever be dangerous, it is on such an occasion as that existing in the Korean capital to-day.

Speaking of this newspaper matter, we read in the Yomiuri Shimbun that until quite recently the Korean papers published in Hawaii, San Francisco and Vladivostock, vied with one another in abusing the Japanese, whom they freely called "beasts" and "savages." Of late, however, the Vladivostock newspaper has changed its tone. It takes the line that resignation is the wisest demeanour to adopt for the moment, and that if the peoples of the Far East have patience they will acquire strength in a few years to shake off the yoke of the arrogant Japanese. This kind of argument seems to have greatly exasperated the Korean journals of Hawaii and San Francisco, and a wordy war has been commenced by these newspapers, on one side, and by their Vladivostock contemporary, on the other.

The Jiji Shimpō propounds an interesting programme. The gist of it is that the method pursued in effecting annexation will be to invite the Emperor of Korea to visit Tokyo for the purpose of presenting to the Mikado a document embodying the proposed change. By that means, Tokyo will become the scene of the measure and any ceremony connected with it. The purpose of this procedure is to deprive Korean agitators of any special occasion for violent demonstrations, and also to make things easy for the Korean Cabinet. It is obviously undesirable that the proclamation of annexation should be made direct by the Ministry in Seoul, and the best way to avoid that is thought to be the above programme. This may be merely one of the many canards now in circulation, but we repeat it for the sake of the interest attaching to it.

We observe that now for the first time the method of dealing with the Imperial House of Korea is becoming a serious subject of discussion. The prevalent theory appears to be that the Throne will be abolished, but that the Imperial Household will be secured in the possession of ample entailed estates. It is contended that the Korean people are not inspired by any very deep sense of loyalty to the Crown. Their zeal in that direction is mainly the outcome of Prince Ito's precepts, and if they seem to attach much importance to the fate of their Sovereign, it will be merely for the purpose of furthering their own ends.

NAVAL INCREMENT.

The distinguished author of "Twenty Five Centuries of Japanese History," Mr. Takenokoshi Yusaburo, is contributing to the Miyako Shimbun a series of articles on the necessity of increasing the Japanese Navy. He is very severe upon the Katsura Cabinet for having adopted the eleven-year programme, and he endeavours to show that the effect of this programme is to play into the hands of the Cabinet by greatly reducing naval expenditure, just at the time when the Ministry may be expected to go out of office. In proof of this, he adduces the following figures showing the appropriation for each year:—

	Yen.
1909	6,426,097
1910	1,790,306
1911	279,510
1912	156,398
1913	121,691
1914	21,031,180
1915	24,780,258

He then goes on to say that the Anglo-Japanese Alliance expires in 1915, and that the chance of getting it renewed depends largely upon the condition of the Japanese navy, which condition is certainly not satisfactory at the recent rate of progress.

We may here quote a table published by the Jiji Shimpō showing the great attention paid by the Powers, at present, to their torpedo-destroyer fleet:—

	1904.		1910.
	Already built.	Building.	Already built.	Building.
England	124	36	150	57
France	24	15	60	17
Russia	47	14	97	—
Germany	37	6	85	12
Italy	11	2	21	2
America	20	—	25	15
Japan	19	1	57	2

Mr. Takenokoshi, writing in the Miyako Shimbun, concludes a series of articles to which we have already alluded in these columns. He presents a very striking list of the Japanese and the American fleets two years hence. His figures are that America will then possess 33 battleships with an armament of 186 twelve-inch guns, and 16 armoured cruisers with an armament of 264 guns from six-inch to ten-inch. On the other hand, Japan's battleships will then be 15 with an armament of 52 twelve-inch guns, and her armoured cruisers will be 14, with 200 guns from six to ten-inch. Mr. Takenokoshi contends that with such figures before her England will never agree to renew her alliances with Japan, and he deems it absolutely essential that the latter Power should apply itself at once to correct this deficiency. The eminent Japanese historian assigns to the people of the United States the character of being somewhat easily led by others, and he says that there is unfortunately no American Katsura nor any Saionji qualified to keep this tendency in check. He concludes that unless Japan prepares herself fully for every emergency repentance may come to her too late.

Captain Ide, of the Imperial Japanese Navy, is quoted by Japanese newspapers as saying that, although there will be no great increase of the navy next year, there will be some additions. Ships will not be ordered abroad, however; they will be built entirely in domestic dock-yards, so that the apprehensions entertained in some quarters as to an exodus of specie will not be realized. It is observable, however, that Capt. Ide says nothing about the imported materials for these ships. He speaks also of torpedo-boats as having been permanently discredited in the recent war. Nothing is now considered of any use except destroyers, and they too will have to be greatly increased in size. He concludes by saying that another appropriation will be asked for next year on account of Chinghai Bay, and that the total outlay in connection with that place is estimated at from 8 to 9 million yen.

We may note here that the Asahi has an article about the development of the fish-torpedo. A few years ago its range did not exceed 500 or 600 metres, but it can now be used up to 6,000. Of course, the range of heavy guns has increased also. The fourteen-inch weapon can now be used effectively at a range of 20,000 metres.

The Chuo Shimbun alleges that the intention is to build three huge armoured cruisers of 25,000 tons each, as well a number of big destroyers. Two of these cruisers will be laid down when the Settsu and the Kawachi are off the slips, which will be in October and May next, respectively.

Meanwhile, the battleship Aki is approaching completion and will undergo her trial trip in September next, so that early next spring she will join the navy. Her dimensions are 19,800 tons' displacement; her speed 20 knots, and her armament four 12-inch and twelve 10-inch.

THE OPIUM QUESTION.

Tokyo journals publish rather perplexing telegrams about the Opium Conference which is to be held at the Hague in November next. According to these messages, the Washington Government has officially inquired whether Peking will be ready by that time to enter the Conference, and has received an answer in the negative. One would imagine that some explanation of China's unpreparedness should be furnished, but there is nothing of the kind, the bare fact alone is stated. The telegrams add detailed statements of the measures which the Conference will be asked to approve for the suppression of the vice.

All this agitation about opium suggests that we may perhaps look forward to a time when similar international action will be taken with regard to alcohol, which does, at least, as much mischief in the world as opium. In fact, it is difficult for any intelligent man to distinguish morally between an opium-smoker and a dram-drinker.

It was perhaps scarcely to be expected that such a gigantic reform as the abolition of the opium vice, with all the vested interests that had accumulated around it during the past century, should be carried out without some hitch. What we have to desire most is that on this occasion Great Britain's procedure may escape any repetition of the opprobrium to which she was subjected in the days of the Canton imbroglio. It is satisfactory, therefore, to find that she has proposed to China that the differences between them shall be submitted to arbitration by the Hague Tribunal. In connexion with the Macao boundary, China has shown that she entertains a certain reluctance to refer her grievances to a purely occidental tribunal, and we cannot be at all surprised that she should be imbued with such a feeling. Hitherto, in nearly all her international difficulties—difficulties in which she must generally have been persuaded that the right was on her own side—she has found herself confronted by a league of Western countries, and it would be strange if she had not learned to think that the Occident is always prepared to find her in the wrong. But no such consideration applies to the opium case. There, the world has been distinctly against England, and if Downing Street now proposes to submit any part of the opium problem to the arbitration of the Hague Tribunal, China may safely assent. The telegrams say, nevertheless, that she is showing some hesitation, and that she is not prepared to make any answer to the arbitration proposal until November next.

We gather from telegrams in the Kokumin Shimbun that the question at issue between England and China with regard to opium is of a somewhat recriminatory nature. The British Government has complained that the vigilance of the Chinese local authorities is not sufficient, and that large quantities of opium are smuggled into China from Persia and elsewhere. To this China replies by saying that although she has suppressed the cultivation of the poppy to the extent of 80 or 90 per cent., the import of opium from British sources has actually increased. According to the telegrams, the suggestion that the matter should be submitted to the Hague Conference came from the United States, and was at once accepted by England, but China has asked to postpone her answer until November.

THE MANCHURIAN RAILWAYS.

Several months ago a good deal was heard of a project for building a line of railway between Tiehling and Hailungchen, but, although the idea was mooted with every appearance of earnestness, the programme soon dropped out of the category of practical undertakings. It has now been revived, however, and at once opposition has been provoked. The distance from Tiehling to Hailungchen is 113 miles and that from Kaiyuan to Hailungchen is a little longer, being 120 miles. But there is said to be no comparison between the facilities of construction. A line from Kaiyuan would not encounter any serious obstacles and might be built at an outlay of 4 million taels, whereas a line from Tiehling would have to negotiate several large rivers and to cross some difficult ravines, so that its cost is estimated at 8 million taels. These calculations are probably largely influenced by the interest of those making them, but at any rate the Kaiyuan line is said to be receiving much support, and if either road be built, the probabilities are in favour of the Kaiyuan route being chosen. Both lines are undesirable from the point of view of the projectors of the Kiling-Changchun road, but no notice is taken of this fact in the telegrams.

We read in the Nichi Nichi Shimbun that the Manchuria Railway authorities have decided to rewrite the loan of 20 million yen which falls due in London next June. Moreover, the Company has only 10 million yen now lying in its coffers, and out of that have to be taken the outlays on account of the Mukden-Antung line and other enterprises. It will be necessary, therefore, to issue another loan of 40 million on the security of the Manchuria lines, and this also will be effected by June next. We anticipate that when Japan enters the London market to seek accommodation on account of the Manchurian railways, very explicit assurances will have to be given against any repetition of the one-sided policy adopted in the case of the first loan, namely, borrowing the money in England and spending it in America.

TIBET.

The Chinese Government appears to be considerably perplexed to find a solution of the Dalai-Lama problem. The factor which chiefly complicates the situation is said to be the attitude of the people of Nepal. The former Dalai Lama was, in effect, the choice of the Nepalese, and they have never wavered in their allegiance to him. It thus falls quite within the range of imminent possibilities that Nepal should declare for the restoration of its Pontiff and should even support the declaration by an appeal to arms. That would be a serious matter, for the military strength of the Nepalese is by no means despicable, and if they invaded Tibet in such a cause, a holy war of some magnitude would probably result. Thus, China, finding herself manacled by such a contingency, is said to be considering the expediency of inviting the old Dalai Lama to reënter Lhasa.

Tibet is evidently regarded in Peking as a critical problem. We stated in our last issue that the attitude of the Nepalese was an important factor in the situation, and this is confirmed by a telegram to the Nichi Nichi Shimbun from Peking. It is explained that the policy of inactivity, hitherto pursued by the Chinese Resident in Lhasa, has been dictated by a conviction that the voice of the people must be consulted carefully before choosing a new Dalai Lama, inasmuch as public sentiment towards that Pontiff is of prime importance. This attitude of procrastination has, however, been rudely shaken by news from Nepal, and by the fact that English troops have appeared upon the scene. A Council of State has therefore been held in Peking, and Prince Su's proposal to reinstate the deposed Lama has been considered. There is evident reluctance, however, to reinstate a Pontiff who was deposed only a few months ago, and the council is said to have broken up without arriving at any decision.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION.

The Chuo Shimbun, which is the chief organ of the Seiyu-kai, adds its voice to those of the Government's assailants in the matter of finance. It tabulates the monies intrusted in various enterprises during the first half of the current year. The figures are as follow:—

	millions.
Industrial enterprises	50
Railways and trams.....	40
Others.....	46
Development of existing enterprises.....	110
Debentures and loans	24
Resuscitated works	45
Debentures redeemed	1
Total	316

Regarded from the point of view of these figures, it cannot be said that the spirit of enterprise has been dormant. Neither can it be said that capital is deficient. Nor can it be said that agricultural prospects are bad. Nevertheless, nothing can hide the fact that there is a feeling of much depression in business circles, and that nobody is disposed to stretch out a hand in any direction. Analysing this state of affairs, the Chuo attributes it entirely to the Government's action in redeeming large quantities of public securities, and in disturbing men's minds by colonization and annexation projects. We must confess that this criticism seems to us very shallow. We cannot but recall the fact that the Government's policy of redemption was received with acclamation at the time of its announcement, and that if any undertakings can be said to have had the support of the Japanese nation, such undertakings are the colonization of Manchuria and the annexation of Korea. Were any foreign financier asked to explain the situation of Japan to-day, his answer would be that the fault lies with the mismanagement of joint-stock companies. How many of such companies are there now in Japan which offer a safe investment? They may be counted on the fingers of one hand. The fact is, we venture to think, that Japan's industry has outstripped her methods.

A REPORT from Formosa says that the Giron aborigines have become quiet. The Gaogon tribe is ready to submit to the Government force. On the 4th instant the transportation corps encountered the aborigines at Bonbon valley, but drove them back with ease. In Shinchiku the laying of wire entanglements, and road construction are near completion.

FORMOSA.

Major Shinozaki, who has just arrived at Moji from Formosa, is quoted as saying that Shinarek mountain has been captured, and that the Japanese troops are now advancing against the aborigines from three directions. The enemy seem to have lost heart, and are now confining themselves entirely to defensive operations, whereas, previously, they acted largely on the offensive. Moreover their weapons and ammunition are practically useless at ranges exceeding 50 or 60 metres.

On the morning of the 4th inst. a party of aborigines made a fierce attack in the neighbourhood of Bonbon Mountain against a detachment of Japanese land-transport men. The aborigines were beaten off after a sharp engagement in which, however, six Aiyu were wounded on the Japanese side. The aborigines are believed to have suffered very severely and there is evidence that their leader was killed.

It is related that a police officer named Nakama, at the head of a band of some 30 aborigines who had surrendered, proceeded recently on a reconnaissance in the direction of Gaogan. They fell in with two parties of natives and urged them to surrender. But the Gaogan obstinately refused to entertain these overtures. They stated that fully one-half of their number had already fallen in fight, and their duty to the dead did not permit them to give in. If the Japanese succeeded in capturing the Shinarek mountain and invading the Kurusha country, it was the intention of the aborigines to regard that as the end of everything and to make a final charge in search of death.

It appears to be true that the aborigines are weakening. Deserters from the camp of the Gaogan report that in that tribe alone 11 have been killed and 47 wounded, and there have been heavy losses in other directions also. The enemies' attacks in this part of the field have become few and far between, so that the Japanese works of circumvallation are progressing satisfactorily. In the Gilan district a party of aborigines have come in and offered to surrender conditionally, but it seems to be doubtful whether they are in earnest.

Major Shinozaki, who was sent by the War Department to inspect and report, has returned to Japan. He states that 30 per-cent. of the obstacles to be encountered represent the resistance of the enemy, and 70 per cent. the difficulties of the ground. Owing to the density of forests it is impossible to see more than 20 yards ahead, and thus superiority of weapons counts for very little. Shinarek mountain has been nearly crowned. Only one-tenth remains to be negotiated, and it is believed that from the summit of this mountain a deadly artillery fire can be poured upon the enemy. But the Major points out that until the summit is actually reached nothing certain can be predicted as to this point.

It is stated that secret importations of arms and ammunition still take place in Formosa, and that stringent measures to prevent this have been adopted by the Authorities. There is nothing new as to the incidents of the fighting, but the weather is said to be very uncertain and sanitation is exceedingly difficult. On the Gilan side 82 men are in hospital suffering chiefly from malaria and kakke, and on the Shinchiku side there are symptoms of an epidemic of dysentery.

It would seem from the latest telegrams that the Gaogan aborigines and other tribes in their vicinity are really disposed to surrender. On the 7th inst. a party of 20 Aiyu and friendly aborigines, under the leadership of Constable Nakama, proceeded to Shinarek mountain, and had an interview with the leaders of the aborigines in that quarter. The visitors found every evidence that the aborigines were exhausted and intimidated. They avowed their willingness to surrender, and even undertook to guide the Japanese in future movements; but as they were not unanimous on this latter point, they were given three days to reflect. It was further observed that all the aborigines in the front line had been withdrawn, from which fact the genuineness of their surrender was inferred.

THE ANGLO-JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

The Kokumin Shimbum devoted a long article to the complaints recently formulated about the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition. Our contemporary treats these complaints as trivial and inconsiderate. They are preferred mainly by men who consider only the commercial aspect of an exhibition and take no account of its international potentiality. For example, it is the general belief among foreigners that Japan's present condition is the outcome of a single leap from a state of semi-barbarism to a highly civilized level. Such a theory naturally carries with it a measure of contempt, and it is most desirable that the false conception should be corrected. This is precisely what the Exhibition has contributed to accomplish. It has exposed to foreign view a panorama of Japan's progress from the earliest days up to the present time, and has proved that the story of the Meiji era is not a sudden transformation but is merely the supplementing of one civilization with another. How many foreigners were familiar with these facts a year ago, and how many more will be familiar with them when the doors of the Exhibition close? Critics should remember the great importance of the information thus furnished to Japan's ally. If the Exhibition had done nothing else it would have fully justified all the expense and trouble invoked. But it has done a great deal more, as no impartial person can deny for a moment. Some Japanese onlookers have been sufficiently thin-skinned to complain that certain side-shows reflected injuriously on the manners and customs of Japan. But whatever was visible at these side shows must be taken as a genuine part of Japan, and to conceal it would have been hypocritical and unwise. The Kokumin concludes by calling attention to the interesting fact that whereas foreign onlookers have had nothing but praise for the Exhibition, loud voices of condemnation have been heard on the Japanese side.

The latest complaint about this Exhibition comes from the exhibitors. They allege that the whole of the decorative scheme of the stalls was upset by order of the Japanese committee, which considered that a total change was necessary to obtain security against fire. The exhibitors were thus put to double expense, and, what was more ruinous, the attractions of their display were destroyed. To this cause they attribute the smallness of the sales effected by them.

It appears that in the interval between the 14th of May, when the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition was opened, and the 10th of July, which seems to be the latest date of statistics, the exhibits disposed of aggregated 222,690 yen, being an average of 4,946 yen daily. These figures are quoted with satisfaction as proving that the Exhibition has not been anything like the failure hitherto spoken of. Doubtless the visit paid by the King and Queen on the 6th inst. will impart a new impetus to the enterprise.

There is just a possibility that the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition may find too many defenders. The Kokumin, for example, takes up the cudgels in its behalf, and contends that though there may have been defects, mistakes and misunderstandings, the enterprise, on the whole, has been a marked success, and has left upon the minds of Englishmen a material impression of Japanese capacity. For our own part, we deem it scarcely necessary to take serious notice of any of the attacks hitherto directed against the Exhibition. In Japanese eyes there may have been features which they would fain have concealed or corrected, but such blemishes have not been visible to British eyes, and in the British press there has been nothing but a chorus of praise. Never yet has there been any public event that did not provoke criticism, the way of humanity being to find fault rather than to pronounce eulogies. In the case of the Exhibition, the only tangible error seems to have been that some of the girls in the tea-houses failed to put on their obis on one or two occasions, and that the Japanese wrestlers showed themselves in the natural garb which they affect at home. Such things are the merest trivialities.

THE COMMERCIAL CODE.

Details of the amendments which the Government intends to ask the Diet to introduce in the Commercial Code are gradually becoming known. There will evidently be very drastic changes. Thus, a director convicted of acts injurious to the company he represents will be liable to imprisonment of 5 years and a fine of 5,000 yen. There are minor penalties, of course, but this maximum figure is eloquent. We note that the Fiji Shimpo is disposed to regard the proposed action as too radical. It apprehends that men will not be found willing to serve on boards of directors in such circumstances, and while fully admitting the necessity for imposing some restraint, our contemporary seems inclined to rely upon that vague generality, the development of a commercial conscience. For our own part, we heartily endorse the Government's intention. It is not our opinion alone but the opinion of many foreign competent judges also, that what is checking Japan's development at present is want of confidence. She has been absolutely shocked by the reckless conduct of directors and auditors of companies, and her capitalists hesitate to embark money in any enterprise, however promising. The two great needs of the time are honest boards of directors and competent chartered accountants. If these needs were satisfied, the development of the country's resources would proceed at a very different rate of progress.

THE TOYO S.S. COMPANY.

The affairs of this ill-fated company promise to become once more a subject of public comment. It will be remembered that one of the Company's great difficulties was how to deal with two tank-steamers which had been built to carry oil for the Namboku Sekiyu-Kaisha. The price of these steamers was 3,400,000 yen, but, in consequence of a heavy tax imposed by the Government on the import of crude oil, the steamers became useless. The question then was, who should pay for these two vessels. The Namboku Sekiyu Kaisha's business had been amalgamated with that of the Hoden Company, and the directors of the Toyo S.S. Co. gave it as their deliberate opinion that no legal claim could be established for recovering the money from either the Namboku or the Hoden. The shareholders of the Toyo Company consequently saw nothing for it but to bow to this heavy loss. It is here that a new and strange feature presents itself. Documents are said to have been discovered amply establishing the Oil Company's liability to pay for the steamers, and the shareholders of the Toyo S.S. Company are enquiring how it happened that these documents had hitherto been overlooked by the directors, and what induced the latter to be so complaisant vis-à-vis such a loss.

There are fresh troubles in the affairs of the Tanko S.S. Co. The kernel of the complication is that the new President, Mr. Murota, has written down the price of the coal lying unsold at the pit's mouth. There are 510,000 tons in this plight, and Mr. Murota insists that, since some of the mineral has been lying exposed to the weather for years, it has no more value, now, for lighting purposes than so much earth would have. Thus, it results that the income of the Company for the first-half of the current year represents only 3,608,632 yen, whereas the expenditures total 4,311,411 yen; the loss thus being 702,779 yen. From the previous account, however, there was brought over a sum of 432,482 yen, so that the net result is a loss of 250,297 yen. The figures Mr. Murota proposes to take as a basis of account, devoting the whole of the future earnings to the restoration of the balance, before anything is paid in the shape of dividends. Certain other shareholders, however, headed by Mr. Amenomiya Keijiro and Mr. Tanaka Shinshichi, insist that it is unreasonable to write down the coal at the pit's mouth so drastically, and that the Company, having actually cleared a profit of 60,000 yen on the half-year's working, is in a position to declare a dividend. These two directors have issued a manifesto animadverting severely on the methods of Mr. Murota and his colleagues, whom they accuse of most perfunctory conduct in the management of the Company's affairs.

Probably, the sympathy of foreigners in general will be with Mr. Murota. It seems quite unbusiness-like to estimate the value of an asset at a sum far in excess of what it would command in the open market.
